BUZZ WORD

Slightly Stoopid lights a reggae groove with a big crowd.

Slightly Stoopid plays the Bank of America Pavilion Aug. 21.

SPIN MAGAZINE dubbed Slightly Stoopid "One of the top 10 bands least likely to succeed based on their name." And if you took a poll in Boston, you probably wouldn't find many people—even young music fans—who have heard of the San Diego rockers.

On the other hand, cofounder Miles Doughty says, "When you hear the name, you're going to remember it anyway. It makes you laugh." And Slightly Stoopid is getting the last laugh, headlining amphitheaters on its Tailgate 2008 Summer Tour, which rolls into the 5000-seat Bank of America Pavilion Aug. 21. Someone obviously knows this band.

"Staying on tour and being persistent has paid off," says Doughty, who splits the group's vocal, guitar and bass duties with Kyle McDonald. "We're definitely under the mainstream [radar], but that's all good. It works for us."

It works primarily because of highly dedicated fans, affectionately known as "Stoopid Heads," who travel from city to city to bask in the group's reggae-steeped grooves.

"We owe it all to them really—the fans come out and make the show crazy," says Doughty, whose band has shunned a few major-label overtures to remain independent and seed their own success. "People at the labels scratch their heads and say, 'How are these people doing that shit?'"

The answer, he says, is that they've paid their dues. "It seems like it's starting to steamroll versus how long it took to get here," Doughty says. "It's still a good 10 years of hard labor before it started to take effect."

Doughty and McDonald launched the band in 1995, but they'd been friends since they were both two years old, living down the street from each other in San Diego's Ocean Beach area. "We were pretty much brothers," says Doughty, 31. "When we weren't in a band, we always said we were going to be in a band, just watching Mötley Crüe videos, saying 'That looks so dope...' We started playing guitars at 12 or 13."

A few years later, the two caught the attention of Sublime frontman Brad Nowell, who signed Slightly Stoopid to his Skunk Records label. Doughty and McDonald had been big fans of Nowell's Long Beach band, particularly its early '90s pre-major label CDs Robbin' the Hood and 40 Oz. to Freedom.

"We like to jam everything. It keeps it fresh."

"It was cool to see one of your idols help you out with the music and get you started," Doughty says. Before Nowell tragically died of a heroin overdose in 1996, he even made a guest appearance on "Prophet," a song for Slightly Stoopid's eponymous debut that Sublime also covered.

Slightly Stoopid largely echoed Sublime in its musical template: punk-rock smoothed out with roots reggae, ska and blues, mellowed to a point that you can even play it acoustically and flavored with a touch of hip-hop.

"As you get older, you broaden the sound," says Doughty, whose band is now augmented by drummer Ryan "RyMo" Moran, percussionist Oguer "OG" Ocon and two musicians from the Boston-rooted group John Brown's Body: saxophonist DeLa (Dan de la Cruz) and trumpeter-keyboardist Chris "C-Money" Welter. "We like to jam everything. It keeps it fresh."

For this tour, Doughty says he's particularly excited about having Jamaica's legendary rhythm team Sly & Robbie as an opening act. "These are guys who created some of the most insane reggae rhythms ever, so playing with them is going to be so cool. Hopefully we'll be doing encores together."

Like many reggae artists—and Sublime, whose "Smoke Two Joints" even landed on radio—Slightly Stoopid isn't shy about touting its love for marijuana. The group recorded "Sensimilla," a chant-along crowd favorite about a potent type of pot, for its new disc Slightly Not Stoned Enough to Eat Breakfast Yet Stoopid, a set of outtakes and rarities.

Indeed, a party vibe is in full effect at Slightly Stoopid shows. "It's like a release point for [fans], you know what I'm saying?" Doughty says. "'Cause they just see us having fun and they do the same thing." But "No Cocaine," another track off the new CD, draws a line conveying that the members of this band don't intend to go out like Nowell.

"We don't mess around with drugs," Doughty says. "We smoke the herb and we drink the liquor. We don't see either of those as drugs—or gateways to anything bad." ***

Balladeers

Journey On

Despite (or because of) a tendency to pair yellow leopard-print shirts with black tuxedo jackets, Journey still draws major crowds. On Aug. 19, the band headlines a concert with Heart and Cheap Trick at the Comcast Center in a nostalgia trip back to the '80s and '90s. Make all the jokes you want about big hair, shoulder pads and flammable fabrics, but have your lighters ready for "Don't Stop Believin'." The fans' reaction is proof that power ballads can transcend bad fashion.

Beauty Out of Brothels

Snap to It If you've seen the award-winning documentary Born Into Brothels, you've witnessed the powerful union of art and youth. Set in the red light district of Calcutta, the film chronicles the experiences of seven children and their mothers, who work as prostitutes. Encouraged by their American photography teacher, the children capture and share their view of a world rarely seen by others. Chase Gallery's new exhibit, Kids With Cameras, features some of those photographs through Aug. 27. Not only do the children convey the transient beauty that exists in shutter-speed lengths and aperture settings but also in their own lives.

Run for It

All Rapped Up

In a time of mega-materialism, how do parents and kids communicate? Text-messaging? "Reverend Run" Simmons, iconic rapper and father of six, has some answers. He shares his wisdom on family values and COEs (Chief Officers of Everything) at a signing for Take Back Your Family: A Challenge to America's Parents Aug. 23 at Brookline Booksmith. Because if you can't trust a music mogul with a reality TV show to help you raise your children, whom can you trust?

Rockie Horoscope {ROCKIE GARDINER}

LADY LUCK

[AUGUST 23–SEPTEMBER 22]
After its annual trip around the zodiac, your Mercury ruler's welcome return to Virgo adds an extra dimension of clarity (not to mention certainty) to your thought process. While the Messenger is teamed up with diligent Saturn in your sign, the hard work you've been doing may finally get recognized. Venus transiting through Virgo this month gives you an artistic edge you occasionally have to forfeit for expediency. So take advantage of the gifts the goddess offers: popularity, affection, good taste and a lucky break.

LIBRA [September 23–October 22]
So much for clandestine online exchanges and other secrets you've been keeping to yourself. Chances are you'll come clean when your Venus ruler hooks up with plain-talking, practically paternal Saturn in Virgo on Aug. 13. And when the Leo sun opposes impressionable Neptune during the Aquarius full moon eclipse, you should be willing to face the music, especially if accompanied by a mojito or two. Disparate currents drifting through the atmosphere can be distracting until highly motivated Mars enters Libra on the 19th.

SCORPIO [October 23–November 21]
It's not the lunar eclipse that'll get to you as much as the problematic square between Mars and Pluto, your corulers, that occurs the same day. When aggressive Mars in your house of peer groups tests resourceful Pluto in your Sag money house you could find yourself at cross-purposes and confused. What'll be your reward for meeting the challenge and will it be worth the price you'll pay? However, if money isn't an issue, will you have to compromise a value you hold dear to maintain an association that's proved valuable?

SAGITTARIUS [November 22–December 21] Back up your files, check your tires. The full moon occurs in your Aquarius house of communication and commuting, so if you're destined to lose something (bytes, Blackberry or air pressure) during the eclipse, that should be the zone where the damage is done. In addition, mid-December Archers may feel under the gun when targeted by militant Mars in your Virgo career zone. The rest of us are simply trying to placate Saturn, the taskmaster, as he enlists the support of Venus and Mercury, the planets ruling almost everyone we're in contact with.

CAPRICORN [December 22–January 20]
The same planetary forces are still in place. However, nebulous Neptune in your Aquarius money house may need closer attention, especially during the partial lunar eclipse on Aug. 16. That's when "things" tend to magically disappear. Despite your Saturn ruler's insistence that you do the best job possible, it's likely that input from Saturn's quickie marriage to romantic Venus will distract you. Try to make some time for yourself, before Mercury's merger with Saturn schedules many meetings and long conversations.

AQUARIUS [January 21–February 18]
The second eclipse of the month on the Leo-Aquarius axis should make it fairly apparent that you're occupying a front seat in this summer's joyride. Whether you're also the driving force should be decided after impressionable Neptune in your sign faces the onslaught of attention beamed on it (and you) from the entertainment-oriented Leo sun. Decide once and for all if the image suits you or if you'd rather fade into the background and continue creating your art undisturbed by other people's ideas of what you should represent.

PISCES [February 19–March 19]
Although what's going on with you may read like a page from an Aquarian's diary, Fish are also facing whatever Saturn in your Virgo partnership house is planning. As it confers with virtuous, value-conscious Venus and shortly thereafter, meddlesome Mercury, the architect of authority can inundate you with rules and regulations. How long before you rebel (remember erratic Uranus in your sign?) depends on what follows from the Leo sun's opposition to your elusive Neptune ruler during the Aquarius full moon eclipse. It may take three months to find out.

ARIES [March 20–April 19]
Friends forever or for this summer only? The connection between the folks you're currently hanging with and the fun you're having may be stretched to the limit by the lunar eclipse. While the high-spirited Leo sun in your house of games opposes the group-centric Aquarius full moon and idealistic Neptune, something's gotta give. Let's hope it won't be as serious a test of philosophies as the problematic square between your militant Mars ruler and power-hungry Pluto would indicate. That could be dangerous.

TAURUS [April 20–May 20]
No sloughing off just because it's summer, give the matter sufficient thought. Mercury's move into quality-conscious Virgo, a supportive earth sign, can provide the information that'll help you reach a decision about a romantic or artistic issue you've been deliberating for a while. Until your Venus ruler merges with stabilizing Saturn midmonth, you might not realize just how important to your long-range happiness this decision is. Although Saturn remains in Virgo until July 2010, Venus leaves at the end of the month.

GEMINI [May 21–June 20]
Too many either/or issues even for the Twins. Tense polarities between the planets focusing on your personal life and those affecting your place in the world could be exhausting. While now may not be the best month for a restorative vacation, take a moment during the full moon/partial lunar eclipse to imagine where you'll go when the time is right. Since the effects of any eclipse can last three months, the right time might be mid-September—when your Mercury ruler and pleasurable Venus meet in your Libra house of recreation and romance.

CANCER [June 21–July 22]
If your life was affected by what resulted from the total solar eclipse in Leo on Aug. 1, chances are the partial lunar eclipse in Aquarius on Aug. 16 won't be that big a deal. Still, any cosmic event that involves your moon ruler can leave its mark on the areas governed by those signs. For those with Cancer rising, this eclipse would have an impact on your sense of values and valuables, earned income and the resources you share with significant others. Fantasy-prone Neptune in Aquarius may magnify the outcome.

LEO [July 23–August 22]
Your turn to curtsy, your partner's turn to bow. Civility and consideration will see you through the highs and lows of the second eclipse of the month. While your sun ruler partially blocks the light of the Aquarius full moon, you may feel even more entitled, more of a force to be reckoned with than ever. Watch out. Remind yourself about pride, the fall and the amount of crow you'll have to eat before the Virgo new moon on Aug. 30 brings this eventful lunar cycle to a close. Is close attention to money matters paying off yet?

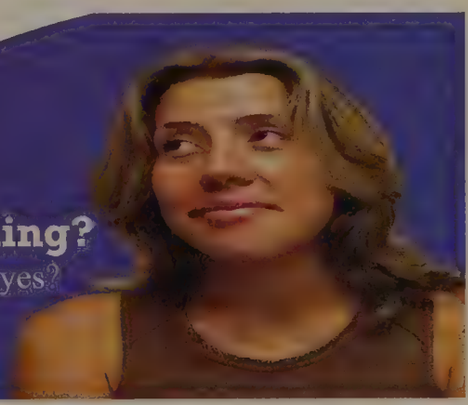
ORA
Clinical Research & Development

Tired of people mentioning your puffy eyes every morning?
Did you know that ORA is researching causes and potential treatments for puffy eyes?



The appearance of puffy eyes in the morning is a frequent cosmetic concern for many middle aged women. Puffy eyes are caused by fluid accumulation in the orbital tissues that surround the eyes. It is believed that this fluid accumulation occurs most often during sleep and dissipates slowly after awakening as gravity drains fluid out of the orbital tissues. The appearance of puffy eyes can last for several hours during the morning. The duration and severity of puffy eyes may also be related to diet, salt intake, eye irritation, amount of sleep, and general fatigue.

ORA Clinical Research & Development is currently evaluating several different investigational eye drops for their ability to improve the appearance of puffy eyes by reducing fluid accumulation in eyelid tissue.

Over the next few weeks ORA will be conducting multiple focus groups in the Boston area. If other people notice your puffy eyes in the morning, and you would like to find out more about how puffy eyes occur and how you may qualify to particpate in the evaluation of future treatments, please contact ORA at (978) 685-8900 and mention this ad. If you know others with puffy eyes that you think may be interested, have them call and mention your name. For each person that you refer, that completes a study, we will pay you a $75 referral bonus – just for letting them know.

TABLE FOR EIGHT

BOSTON'S BEST WAY TO MEET

MOPSY

SERENDIPITOUS SHOPPING: OUR UNFETTERED CORRESPONDENT SEEKS OUT THE SALUBRIOUS AND THE CEREBRAL

BY MOPSY STRANGE KENNEDY

REALITY DINING

Table for Eight (866-822-5348 or www.tableforeight.com) is a social introduction service. Five parties cost $225. Table for Eight replicates the way people used to meet by bringing people physically together to dine. Indeed, many members of this 20-year-old service are disillusioned on-line daters who are tired of the cat-and-clicking-mouse games of such contacts and their frequent deceptions. Table for Eight people span in age from late 20s to late 40s, with a smattering of baby-boomers. Typical members have been busy cultivating their professional lives with an income averaging $73,000, perhaps figuratively married to their career but now considering the corporeal variation: 75 percent haven't been married yet and are childless. The actual table – located at a restaurant like Sibling Rivalry, Cuvee Cuvee or Le Mistral – must be round, no harsh, excluding edges. This serendipity of strangers brought together has been compared to the gemutlich flavor of wedding reception dinners. You can dine with such semtillating types of physicians, lawyers, psychologists, and teachers and scientists from local prestigious universities. An initial phone interview involving 10 questions screens members and identifies interests, views and preferences. Although friendship and networking are benefits of dining with new people, Table for Eight also boasts at least 60 engagements, that they know of, that have resulted from their restaurant get-togethers in the last five years.

TROJAN SCORE

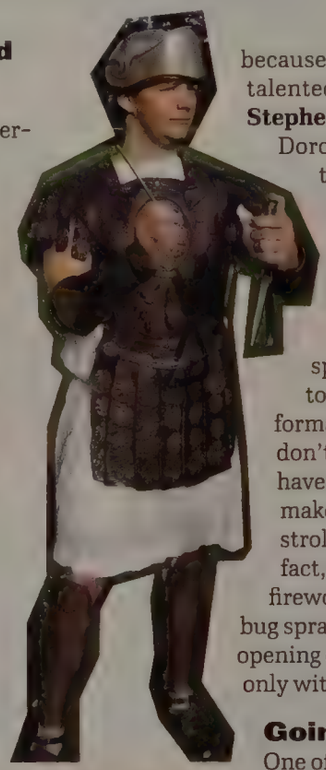
Natalia and David Worth at the Aquarium's Sharks & Rays VIP Opening

Oh, What a Tangled Wood We Weave...

As usual, the weather was bipolar, alternating between Biblical rainstorms and blinding sunshine until just before the party began (and no doubt giving the organizers a major case of the vapors).

Also as usual, the skies cleared and it was a glorious summer evening for Opening Night at Tanglewood, which began with copious cocktails and a delicious dinner under a tent, followed by a stellar performance by James Levine and the Boston Symphony Orchestra, topped off with a fireworks display fit for a Chinese emperor.

The crowd that supports the BSO at its summer home in the Berkshires is skewed heavily toward New York (hence the flyer from Madison Avenue Plastic Surgery in the goody bag), but there were plenty of prominent locals as well.



A Trojan bangs the dinner gong at Tanglewood

Among them: honorary chair Kim Taylor (whose husband, James, was off playing a gig in Canada), mega-benefactors Jacqueline and Albert Togut, board chair Ed Linde and his fashionable other half, Joyce, grande dames Sandy Krakoff and Carol Rudman, the absurdly handsome Dan Mathieu and Tom Potter, state rep. Smitty Pignatelli (who the hell wouldn't vote for him because of his name alone?), über-talented artist Jane Miller, and both Stephen and Dorothy Weber and Dorothy and Stephen Weber (either there are four of them or there was a typo in the program listing them twice).

The concert itself was Part I of The Trojans by Berlioz, so anyone who had seen it this spring at Symphony Hall was free to wander the incredibly beautiful formal gardens, which most people don't even know exist. The gardens have high, maze-like hedges that make it a great place for a romantic stroll, if you catch my euphemism. In fact, had you timed it right with the fireworks (and brought along enough bug spray), you could have reenacted the opening credits of Love, American Style... only with better music, of course.

Going to the Dogs...

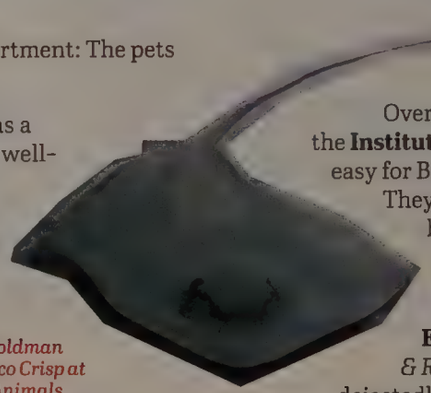
One of the few parties where it's perfectly acceptable to call someone's date a bitch is Party Animals, a benefit for the MSPCA and Angell-Memorial. The event was held at the Foundation Lounge and guests were invited to bring along their four-legged other halves.

(Memo to the health department: The pets stayed on the patio.)

Despite all the dogs, it was a good-looking crowd, and well-dressed, too, especially with the likes of affable Brahmin George Lewis Jr., the radiant Jessica Gifford Busch, financial wizard Robert White, the dashing and debonair Gene Goldman (squired by his French bulldog, Coco Crisp), ubiquitous party babe Amy Finsilver, the recently blonde Marisa Fiumara, a standard poodle named Chopper who won the costume contest with his Celtics jersey and one man who responded to the question, "How are you?" by saying, "Well, I think I've gotten married and divorced since the last time I saw you."

However, the evening's most ridiculous exchange came when a guest asked a friend, "Where's your dog?" and she said, "Zooey had another event to go to."

Mary Schwager and Greg Menges at the Aquarium's Sharks & Rays VIP Opening



Gene Goldman and Coco Crisp at Party Animals

Random Quote of the Month...

Overheard at a cocktail party to benefit the Institute of Contemporary Art: "It's easy for Brahmins to cheat on each other. They're so inbred the DNA tests come back the same."

Name That Anchor...

At the VIP Opening of the New England Aquarium's new Sharks & Rays exhibit, one guest pointed dejectedly into the Touch Tank and said, "That's a shark?"

"What?" responded her husband, "You expected them to put a great white in the petting tank?"

While that would certainly thin out the herds of annoying tourists, it would just as certainly pose a liability issue, but all that aside, it's a fascinating exhibit. The first reader to correctly guess which local TV personality petted this sting-ray just before its picture was taken will win admission for two. Hint: He has perfect teeth, all his own hair and works at WCVB-Channel 5. ✖✖✖

Bag Envy

The Improper's fashion editor, Ruth Basloe, had barely pulled the black handbag from its box when the women swarmed. "I'm definitely buying it," one told another, brandishing the doctor's satchel. I hadn't seen such action in the editorial department since Nick Altschuller tried on a metallic leotard. Followed by Rich Levine. But that's another story. The Coach purse left the magazine's female staff drooling. And it was only the beginning, as Ruth unveiled more must-have items for the season ahead.

See for yourself in this issue's three features, which include seven pages of fall trends—from chunky knits to gothic glam. Photographed at Boston University, our back-to-school piece updates the ever-present college look. You'll also find our favorite accessories; the fedora is especially easy to pull off.

You might notice one missing fad, however. I happily admit that no pegged pants appear in this issue. Katie Holmes can do whatever she wants, but The Improper's women are united in more than their love of Coach. We refuse to fold and tight-roll our jeans.

Singapore Bling

A FINE VINTAGE

Recycling isn't all about washing bottles and sorting through compost. It can make for stylish accessories, too, as in the case of Cambridge designer Sherry Libedinsky's jewelry line. The Singapore native retools vintage pieces as raw materials for her romantic-looking, whimsical works.

"I love vintage things," says Libedinsky, who by day is a Harvard graduate student in biology. "Things that are very detailed and well made. A lot of people think of vintage as thrift or throwaway, but I pair it with gemstones."

Libedinsky started designing jewelry as a means to relax from schoolwork and share a bonding activity with her sister in Singapore. She ventured online to see if her pieces might sell, and within three months, her hobby had blossomed into a business. Now boutiques from New York to Italy carry Pequitobun (named after her pet bunny, Pequito).

Once she started turning a profit, Libedinsky discovered that she could afford costlier, more glamorous materials. "All girls like sparkly things," she says. "My favorite is aquamarine. It goes well both for day and night, and it has beautiful, iridescent crystals in it." Her most popular gemstones, however, are green amethysts and blue chalcedony ("It almost glows against gold!"). Big sellers include her vintage "rockers," elaborate chains, several inches long, strung with gems and old charms. "I put a lot of effort into making the colors go together, so they're not too frilly, but fun."

Although she plans on graduating in a year, Libedinsky won't be giving up her artistic outlet. "Designing relaxes and soothes me," she says. "But I wouldn't be able to design unless I found pretty things."

Drink of the Moment

Lush Slush

The slip is understandable. Call 'em snow cones, raspados, piraguas, whatever, shaved ice is served around the world and is beloved by soon-to-be-sticky children and nostalgia-hungry adults.

Also served individually ($6), chef Dante de Magistris' favorite is the limoncello granita, made from house-made limoncello, citrus vodka, lemonade concentrate, water, sugar and lemon segments. Eating one reminds him of summers spent on the Italian coast while the flavors stoke the skills of his profession. "I have this thing for lemons and the balance of acid and sweetness," de Magistris says after a spoonful. "Balance takes years to learn. A lot of cocktails made with lemons are too tart and too sweet. This one is just the perfect recipe."

The bourbon granita is the preferred version of manager Seth Yaffe. The former cook and veteran of 120-degree South End kitchens says, "This is the way chefs used to calm us down at the end of the night: a coffee mug of bourbon over crushed ice." The iteration is mixed with orange juice and lemonade, unsweetened iced tea, lemon segments and Wild Turkey. The Kentucky bourbon is usually just a kick in the teeth served next to your beer, but here it powers through the sugar to remind you this is a cocktail and not something you could buy off a Mister Softee truck. "I wanted something that was a little hotter because it still tastes like bourbon and not something bourbon flavored," Yaffe explains.

Then there is the Campari and grapefruit granita. For many, Campari is reminiscent of those early stolen swigs from the liquor cabinet, when one sour sip led to the bottle being quickly put back. In this version, the apertif retains its earthy bite, which can then be cut with chunks of grapefruit rind. "For the American palate, Campari can be kind of bitter," Yeffe acknowledges. "This is an introduction." And a grown-up way to drink like a kid again.

Good Eats

Bar Bread and Cheese

Most any beer buff would award a classy watering hole like Deep Ellum top honors for its tap selection alone—JK Scrumpy's Hard Cider, for example, or Affligem Blond. So it seems only fitting that this narrow slice of Allston puts an above-average twist on pub grub, too. Take a look down the line of barstools, and you'll see plenty a patron digging into the duo of warm, chewy pretzels and dipping cheese. Naturally, it's spiked with stout.

Question for Sondra Grace

What are the season's top three fashion faux pas?

Professor Sondra Grace is head of fashion design at MassArt.

1. People who lift an ensemble wholesale from a runway or magazine. If you've taken the T, you've probably suffered eye-fatigue from witnessing all the women bedecked in scarves, scoop-necked pregnancy-style tops, skinny jeans and ballet flats.

2. People who hold onto something longer than its fashion shelf-life, desperately hoping that it'll make a comeback. The trends that do return—like the recent leopard-print craze—are overshadowed by the many misguided ones that die an ignoble death. One style that should be relegated to the past: Katie Holmes' pegged loose jeans.

3. Men who still think dropped-waist pants are edgy. There's nothing original about wearing your pants the same way the handy man flashing his butt crack does.

GETTING KRANKY

Cardiovascular group activity has come a long way since Richard Simmons' heyday. Its fine-tuned evolution is due in large part to Johnny G, the man behind spinning—and now kranking. What sounds like a hip-hop dance is actually a new workout. The stationary machine has two hand-pedals that revolve in circular motions to target your arms, upper body and core, without adding the bulk typical with anaerobic activities. Alexa Malzone, group exercise manager at Sports Club/LA (and expert kranker), has begun introducing the device in her classes. "When you ask gym members the last time they did something new in their fitness routine, most haven't in a long time, and they've stopped seeing results," Malzone says. "Now, we've added a new class and a new piece of equipment that's going to change their bodies in a different way."

Going Out

DOT'S THE SPOT

When Chris Douglass began at Icarus in 1978, the South End had location, people and character—but nothing that revealed its now deep dining market. "Eventually, they kept adding restaurants and people kept coming," Douglass explains. He sees similar potential in Lower Dorchester. With the success of Douglass' three-year-old Ashmont Grill, the approximately $44-million renovation of the T station and the construction of a new residence/retail building, the spot seems poised for growth. So when a restaurant space was planned for development, the 20-year Dorchester resident staked his claim. "I'd rather it be me that sets the terms of competition," he says inside his recently opened Tavolo.

Tavolo also allows Douglass to create a venue with a neighborhood feel. Inside the 100-seat dining area, punctuated with bright colors inspired by the Italian flag, there's a giant horseshoe-shaped bar envisioned as a gathering spot. "There are never enough seats at the Ashmont Grill bar, and people really get to know each other at the bar," he says slapping the slate where servers chalk the names of newcomers until they recognize them as regulars.

For food, Douglass designed a deceptively straightforward menu of make-your-own antipasti, paninis ($7-$9), pizzas ($9-$12) and pastas ($10-$18). Per his reputation, dishes incorporate fresh ingredients from local farms. While the approach looks simple (spaghetti and meatballs, $16), Douglass adds, "We have some complicated sauces, and as I learned at Ashmont Grill, if you want high quality, it still takes a lot of work."

In the private dining area, he says, "I want it to be friendly for kids," waving at a mural that looks like Chef Pigs in Space. Douglass's challenge will be balancing high craft and service with the dynamics of the on-the-go world. "I've been someone who has respected food traditions, so I'm not reinventing something whole cloth," he clarifies. "Hopefully it's the style and sensibility of this that makes it a Chris Douglass restaurant."

CIVIC LESSON

DEAR PSYCHO CIVIC DRIVER:
If you read this, you'll know who you are. You drove your crappy Civic straight at me while I was crossing Tremont Street in the South End when you had a red light. You went ballistic honking your horn, giving me the finger and yelling expletives out your window. Since the light was red and I was on a crosswalk, I am still not sure what type of crack you were smoking to make you think that you were in the right. But, since you thought driving your car within inches of me was OK, I figured a nice little kick to your front bumper would help make your day. You then abandoned your car in the middle of the street, so as to grab your balls and unleash some of the most disgusting language I have ever heard—to the great amusement of myself, everyone dining at Pops and most of the pedestrians on Tremont Street. From your actions I'm guessing that you either just got dumped and/or haven't gotten laid since 1982. PS: I wish I had dented your car or the airbag went off in your face.

Sincerely,
Girl legally crossing at a crosswalk

You were on the Orange Line train from Oak Grove to Downtown Crossing:

I never know what to say, because most of the time I either put my foot in my mouth or should've never said anything in the first place. You were sitting in the first seat near the door with a white dress shirt and khaki pants. You have blonde hair and are extremely amazing! Again, I don't know if you saw me or care. I did want to say something but couldn't. I had on a baseball hat and black T-shirt. Maybe you'll see this, maybe you won't. If you do and you did smile at me for other reasons than just to be nice, please e-mail me or say hello next time you see me. If it was just to be nice... I'll take that.

Desperately seeking Darby:

We met at Clink over the winter, and although you wouldn't agree to a date on the spot, you did give me your number. You might remember I put it right into my cool new iPhone. Well, on the way home, the iPhone was lost in a cab! If you haven't run off with the cabbie, it would be great to have that date! E-mail me at byebyeiphone@gmail.com if you're game.

Rob

To the balding, up-there-in-years gentleman (and it's with serious reservations that I use that term) who works out at a prominent fitness center near Government Center 7–8 am on weekdays:

You really need to be more discreet with staring at the ladies. It's blatantly obvious. OK, I mean I'm a guy and admit that I will subtly take my notice here and there, as most of us are guilty of. However, when you are doing full head turns to get a better glimpse of the women walking by while you are barely even breaking a sweat on the elliptical, that's just being a scumbag, I'm sorry. Especially when most of the ladies you are checking out are easily 20 to 30 years younger than you are, to boot. As there are considerably more guys at the center than ladies during that time frame, your actions hardly help that cause. Please save us all from further awkward moments, as we're just trying to get in our morning workouts. Give it a rest!

ASK THE EXPERT

MICHAEL TONELLO
BOSTON-BORN AUTHOR OF BRINGING HOME THE BIRKIN AND COLUMNIST FOR THE HUFFINGTON POST

Q: WHAT SHOULD BARGAIN HUNTERS LOOK FOR WHEN SEARCHING EBAY FOR LUXURY GOODS?

Luxury-designer goods do not fall off the back of some truck—or at least I never got so lucky. They are specialty items, made by a handful of high-end design houses, and whether you think the prices are ridiculous or not, the fact is this: They cost what they cost. So, if a purse, blouse or wristwatch retails for $1,000... it almost always costs $1,000. Even in the bargain-happy world of eBay, you generally won't find a luxury item in brand-new, "store-fresh" condition for less than retail. The exception to this would be [buying] "gently used" items, which can definitely save you a bundle. Just make sure that there are a lot of photographs on the auction, and that you look at all of them closely. If something is advertised as brand-new and listed at less than retail, that's a red flag to me—I will then look at the seller's feedback, sales history, etc. When a seller says things like "I received this as a gift and don't want it" or "my grandmother gave this to me," that's yet another red flag. People don't normally give other people ultra-expensive gifts that are unwanted. So you are probably looking at a counterfeit or a used item. Most important is this: If a seller insists on payment by money order or check, then run in the other direction. You have no recourse with a "cash" payment. Using a credit card gives you the added security of knowing you can do a chargeback, in the event what you receive is not what you thought you were buying.

STOP & SHOP

A pair of stores worth perusing

BOSTON: Armoire

BETWEEN THE WINE Emporium and Le Petit Robert Bistro sits Armoire, tucked away like a great fashion find. Just three months old, the consignment shop boasts upscale labels including Calvin Klein and Gucci. "The first few weeks and months were rather slow, but word of mouth got around, and we've seen a steady pickup in our traffic," general manager Bobby Dickens says. "Before we arrived, there wasn't much shopping at this end of town. Aside from Tremont Street, clothing stores are a rarity in the South End."

Another rarity: Armoire splits its merchandise equally among the sexes. Dickens credits this to the neighborhood. "The male population of the South End gives us an opportunity to attract a market that is sometimes forgotten." Even with its men's selections, the most popular items remain handbags and accessories. "Sunglasses rarely stay overnight; a pair of Christian Dior is here for maybe half a day."

Plans for expansion are already under way. "Eventually the idea is to open a retail boutique and let the consignment shop serve as an outlet where items that don't sell in one season can be discounted," he says. For now, old still seems new again.

CAMBRIDGE: Passport

MOST TRAVELERS spend their first moments at a hotel trying to transform themselves from tired tourists into groomed globetrotters. Thanks to Passport, they can arrive and depart in style. Owner Jessica Good has stocked her Harvard Square boutique with chic, travel-friendly apparel and accessories. "I've always been a big traveler," Good says. "Passport is a perfect match for Cambridge because of the different people from all over the world that are coming and going all of the time."

Opened last week, the store offers versatile clothing in flexible fabrics. "You won't find any linen pants," she jokes. Instead, most pieces come in jersey or other cotton blends that are less likely to wrinkle. Lines include Love by Ya-Ya, Rachel Pally and Twinkle. And for the items that do get crumpled, there's Crease Release, a packable spray. Jetsetters can also pick up specialty luggage designed to meet pesky airline requirements and transparent makeup bags that accommodate the ever-changing standards for carry-on cosmetics.

Good's parting advice: Wear sunglasses. "They call it 'the red-eye' for a reason," she observes.

THINK DIFFERENT

On comical philosophy and clever design

But Metaphysically, Folks!

A MAN WALKS INTO his closet to find his wife's lover there, naked. "What are you doing here?" the husband asks. "Everybody's gotta be somewhere," comes the reply. That's existentialism for you. In their book Plato and a Platypus Walk Into a Bar, Thomas Cathcart and Daniel Klein, wise guys in both senses, realize that the exalted notions and weird paradoxes of stern-faced philosophy, which hover Way Up There, are also Way Out There, crashing into humor. "Nietzsche's 'will to power' has been blamed for everything from German militarism to sauerkraut" connects to this joke: "The problem with German food is that, no matter how much you eat, an hour later you're hungry for power." And Kant's "categorical imperative" segues nicely into: "A sadist is a masochist who follows the golden rule." These Grouchos of Knowledge, endlessly frisky, manage to explain the big ideas by means of the funny bone. For instance, take this sort of which-came-first twist of epistemology: Joe: "What a fabulous singer, huh?" Blow: "Ha! If I had his voice, I'd be just as good." Or consider the fragility of identity: Two quackers on the doorstep ask a man: "Have you ever thought of becoming a duck?" Harvard alums Thomas Cathcart and Daniel Klein's Plato and a Platypus Walk Into a Bar attempts to demystify philosophy through jokes.

A GRAND PLAN Adaptive Environments

Cogito Ergo Nomic

EVERYTHING AT Adaptive Environments illustrates, in an airy and aesthetic way, this design firm's sensibility and beliefs. The concepts of environmental sustainability, physical ease and comfort for the varyingly "abled"—in shades of green and the ergonomic—are omnipresent. Its shop has items like the ingenious Pecon pill case that squeezes open to dispense medicine and then tucks in tight, purse-fittable and pretty. Rounded animals in a foam material are half-furniture, half-toys for kids, encouraging flexibility and safe, limber bouncing. Achy fingers will love the arrow-shaped pen that can be held differently, eccentrically for greater comfort. Self-effacingly small Baggu Bags—for groceries and other items—help hasten the end of the plastic-bag administration. Also displayed are bikes whose seats move vertically to gracefully release you and Washlet bidets, with a streamlined wand, an air dryer and a heated seat. (This toilet definitely does meditation.) Employees, their own bikes stashed indoors, sit at curvaceously interlocking tables and walk past a resource library (open to the public) in an atmosphere of usefulness, originality and beauty. Adaptive Environments (200 Portland St., Boston; 617-695-1225; adaptiveenvironments.org) promotes human-centered design.

The Square Comes Full Circle As one enthusiastic Cantabrigian put it, Market in the Square is the most brilliant thing to hit Harvard Square since, well, Harvard. Long overdue in a town full of hungry, stressed students, Church Street's gleaming storefront finally offers a 24-hour feeding spot—where everything isn't fried. We'll generously call it a gourmet grocer; its niche falls between Dean and DeLuca and Store 24. Prosciutto di Parma sounds pretty tasty at 3 am, for one, as do the macaroni salad, Japanese gummies and (albeit pricey) hot buffet bar.

CLUCKIN' AROUND

Tastes like chicken and...

Eggs and bacon. Fish and chips. Chicken and... waffles? Generally categorized as a Southern dish, it's a combination new to Boston and "a work in progress" at the Hen House Wings 'N Waffles, according to head chef Ken Rivera Jr. Less than two months after opening in Newmarket Square, Rivera and his father are juggling the logistics of both an extensive menu (they have 14 sauces, from apricot chipotle to Jamaican jerk to General Tso, plus house-made sides, pizzas, sandwiches and salads) and a challenging location: just a couple blocks from Boston Medical Center. It's a big change from Rivera's previous stint at the former Flux in the restaurant-rich South End. Word of mouth, he says, is bringing repeat customers back for collards, macaroni and cheese, and smoked cheddar grits "made from scratch, from family recipes."

Ken & Ken Jr.

If you hear "mountain food" and think "trail mix," you haven't been to Annapurna yet in Porter Square. The restaurant specializes in the cuisines of Nepal, India, Tibet and Afghanistan. Dishes such as beef masala with Himalayan herbs show the mingling of culinary cultures; lots of vegetarian choices and a handful of items for picky eaters (burger, Caesar salad) mean it's great for a diverse group of diners.

Stephanie Sokolove, owner/executive chef of Stephanie's on Newbury, will open a South End restaurant in the former Garden of Eden space. "We're doing a gut job there; it's in such bad condition," Sokolove sighs. But when work is finished—hopefully by December or January—Stephi's on Tremont will boast a glassed-in "finishing kitchen" with a rotisserie and panini machine, a "huge bar" and, of course, a patio... eventually. Expect "the same type of comfort food" served at "a little bit smaller" portions and perhaps some "experimental" or "international" touches.

GRAZED AND CONFUSED

Estragon hits highs and lows with tasty tapas and shifting service.

MEN HUNT. Women gather. Yuppies graze. The quest for variety has led to the ubiquitous small plate, allowing adventurous diners to test the range of a kitchen's repertoire without filling up on large portions. Spanish restaurants like Somerville's Dalí and the South End's Toro, with their traditional tapas, are the original embodiments of this approach. With Estragon's opening on Harrison Avenue, the small-plate wars are heating up.

Julio de Haro, whose Taberna de Haro maintains a loyal following in Brookline, has ventured into the hip frontier that is SoWa. Estragon's speakeasy sophistication and eclectic decor—black-and-white checkerboard tiles, Art Deco light fixtures, black cafe curtains—fit the trendy neighborhood. The menu is equally diverse. More than two-dozen tapas beckoned on our visits. We had a whirlwind sampling.

First, an assortment of complimentary olives arrived, followed by pimientos de pedrón ($8), small green peppers encrusted with salt and blistered over a hot fire. Next we had two classics: tortilla española ($4), a potato, onion and egg omelet with an engaging texture, and pintxo de jamon blanco ($7), which consisted of a slice of ham fat, garnished with honey and almonds and served on a piece of toast. More exotic, berenjenas asadas ($6)—roasted eggplant with nuggets of chorizo and pine nuts—provided a robust counterpoint to the mellow pintxo. Meanwhile, a small ceramic casserole of txistorra de la casa ($7) brought tender, spicy house-made Basque sausage.

From there, espárragos verdes y aceite de limón ($7) delivered spears of green asparagus dressed with lemon oil and crowned with shavings of Manchego cheese. Gambas al ajillo's ($11) small shrimp showed perfect texture and lively flavor, but cocotxas al pil pil ($8), or fried cod cheeks, seemed lackluster in comparison. More memorable was the viera con alcachofa y crema de almendra ($10), which paired a giant scallop with a fried baby artichoke in a delicious almond cream sauce.

We found the croquetas de jamon ($10), ham croquettes, pleasant but one dimensional, their golden-brown crust enveloping a puréed potato filling with only a whisper of minced ham. Pancetta ($8), on the other hand, delivered a remarkably rich and tasty block of seared pork belly garnished with tender, purple pearl onions and al dente, bright green peas in an imaginative orange juice and paprika sauce. Paprika also made an appearance on the last of the tapas we tried, garbanzos fritos ($4). These deep-fried chick peas could mount a serious challenge to potato chips in satisfying the hunger for savory snacks.

Main courses at Estragon ranged from fair to quite good. Fair was the paella ($21). Its crusty rice was excellent, but there was so little it seemed a cruel tease. Moreover, it had a scant, perfunctory scattering of red pepper strips, small morsels of chicken, four mussels and a couple of small shrimp. It may have contained fragments of sausage, but nothing I could sink my teeth into. Where were the peas, clams and artichoke hearts? AWOL with the rest of the rice. After the disappointing paella, things got much better. Pincho moruno ($24), skewers of grilled lamb spiced with cumin, garlic and chile, shared the plate with a wonderful mix of sautéed oyster mushrooms and green and yellow beans. Pollito a la parrilla ($16), one half of a small chicken, was grilled over a high heat rendering its skin crisp and its flesh succulent. It came with an exquisite Romesco sauce, a mouthfilling meld of olive oil, red-pepper puree, ground almonds and garlic.

Red-wine sangria

In the wine department, Estragon offered a value-priced 2006 Jumilla from Luzon Verde ($25), a grapey but pleasant Monestrell, as well as more exalted (and expensive) selections. We loved the red-wine sangria ($7 for a large glass), pleasantly sweet but not cloying. Desserts included a toothsome cylinder of excellent flan ($6), but pound cake with fresh peaches ($8) was dry, the fruit unripe and the zabaglione sauce sparse. The service also was inconsistent. Some waiters performed admirably. Others seemed clueless. Sometimes bread and olive oil were brought promptly and water glasses filled; other times we had to ask. This spot clearly has the cooking talent to impress diners on a consistent basis. If it achieves equal regularity in its focus and discipline, Estragon will become a tapas threat. ✖✖✖

RIDING WAVES

The Harley Davidson Rock 'n' Ride to benefit Pitching in for Kids and the Doug Flutie Jr. Foundation for Autism took place Aug. 3. The day began with a barbecue at Bruce Rossmeyer's Harley Davidson in Everett, followed by a ride to the Hard Rock Cafe Boston for appetizers, auctions and a performance by the Flutie Brothers Band. More than 100 people attended the event, which raised $40,000.

Sailboats raced in Boston Harbor Aug. 9 as part of the Flip Flop Regatta to benefit the Ally Foundation. Some 450 people attended a party afterward at the Courageous Sailing Center in the Charlestown Navy Yard. The event raised $100,000 to expand the foundation nationally.

SO YOU WANT TO WRITE?

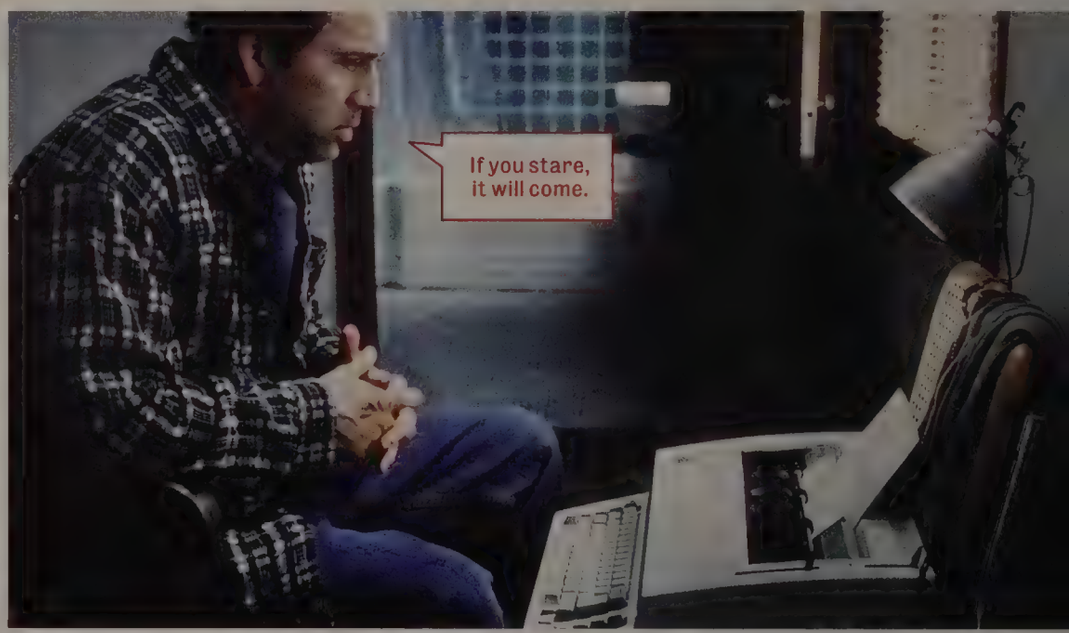
Here's how. Ready, set, scribble.

I'M A BIG FAN OF Boston.com's "Most E-Mailed" list, a daily tally that provides valuable insight into the subjects that matter to the people of our city. Whether it's the YouTube clip of the lion running out of the jungle and inexplicably embracing his former captors, or a breaking story about how gas prices are high and the housing market stinks, the list is a peek into our collective psyche. So I was highly surprised when I saw recently that the most-forwarded story was entitled, "So you want to be a writer? Here's how."

Obviously, lots of people want to be writers, envisioning romantic adventures, deep-sea fishing, bullfighting and eventually some epic alcoholism followed by suicide. But it's not all matadors and guns to the head, my friend. Maybe that was the case once upon a time, but these days, most writing is accomplished while staring at the bleak glow of Microsoft Word, wearing sweatpants and sweating deadlines. Ever hear of carpal tunnel? It's no joke. Of course, I'm trying to discourage you from writing because I don't want any more competition.

Allegra Goodman, however, wants you to try putting words to paper. She's a novelist and the author of the much–e-mailed "So you want to be a writer?" article. Since I'm always eager to improve myself and steal ideas, I decided to read her advice and see if it applied to me. "To begin, don't write about yourself," she says. "I'm not saying you're uninteresting. I realize that your life has been so crazy no one could make this stuff up. But if you want to be a writer, start by writing about other people." One problem with this supposition is that other people get mad when you write anything halfway interesting about them. On the other hand, I can say anything I want about myself. If I decide to write that I just got a barbed-wire–style tattoo on my arm when I really got the alphabet, I'm not too worried about a lawsuit. And another thing: I don't really know the interesting stuff that happens to other people. I guess I could pay more attention to my fellow human beings, but that sounds like a lot of effort. What am I, a PI? Am I on a stakeout? No.

Goodman has more suggestions. "Try writing without a computer altogether," she says. "Treat yourself to pen and paper and make a mess." This might be a good idea if you're the type of person who can read your own handwriting. I write with my right hand curled into a painful leper claw, which is slow and messy. I frequently take handwritten notes during interviews; when transcribing them on my computer, I end up staring at the notebook and typing, "I globber glued the fish right 2,400 ips sniiiber." Then I paraphrase, based on what I sort of remember from the actual conversation. I've gotta think this would be a tough way to write a novel.



Study grammar, you idiot. Put away the thesaurus; nobody is impressed.

"Read widely," Goodman continues, "and dissect books in your mind. What, exactly, makes David Sedaris funny?" I'm gonna go out on a limb and suggest that one reason that David Sedaris is funny is because he writes about his own funny experiences, which would seem to contradict her first tip, "Don't write about yourself." Also, his brain works in a way that yours doesn't. I once interviewed him, and I posed the following question: If you could have one person taxidermied and displayed in your living room, who would it be? He thought it over for a moment and replied, "Christine Todd Whitman, former governor of New Jersey. Because people would walk in and say, 'Hey, is that Christine Todd Whitman?'" If you have to think about what makes that funny, then you probably also submit ideas to the comic strip "Pluggers" and move your lips while reading USA Today.

Goodman thinks you should explore poetry: "Don't forget poetry," she writes. "Why? Because it's good to go where words are worshipped, and essential to remember that you are not a poet." If I'm not a poet, then how do you explain the lines, "Look at the sky / It goes up real far / I like to protect it / I fart in a jar"—an old fave I wrote for a high-school poetry class when we were studying transcendentalism? Here, I'll drop another example on you: "If I am not a poet, then what am I?" Hmmmm. Hmmm. Hmm. Hm? That's my latest poem. And if you don't like it, then you don't understand my genius. And if being a poet and a writer are mutually exclusive, then nobody told the esteemed author of E.A.R.L.: The Autobiography of DMX. I rest my case. Arf, arf, ARF!

It'd be jerky of me to criticize Goodman's article without offering some ideas of my own, so here we go: Study grammar, you idiot. Write about something that someone gives a crap about. Put away the thesaurus; nobody's impressed. Instead of plagiarizing, just change things around a little bit so you don't get caught. Don't read anything written before 1985 because it's all jibber-jabber about the Potato Famine and unrequited Victorian romance. And don't apply for my job, because these sweatpants don't pay for themselves, and I'll find you. Happy writing! ✖✖✖

ODE TO AN ARTS MAVEN

Our columnist really, really likes Anita Walker.

THE MASSACHUSETTS Cultural Council is one of those state agencies whose funding decisions improve our lives. (Disclaimer: I've served on its board.) The MCC doles out more than $12 million a year—virtually all of the public arts funding in Massachusetts. It helps the big institutions, like the MFA, the Huntington Theatre, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, as well as small theaters, dance companies, music groups and creative individuals (writers, painters, poets, sculptors). The MCC also grants money to every city and town in the state. To a lesser extent, supporting the sciences is a mandate.

So why does it remain unknown? The biggest reason is that it's government—make no waves, stay under the radar, lobby the entire year for next year's budget. But the agency should be in your face. After all, the positive impact on our economy generated by cultural endeavors is estimated at some 37,000 jobs and $4.2 billion dollars. Does the Mass. Turnpike Authority bring us joy? Does the MBTA inspire us? Does the Registry of Motor Vehicles summon standing O's?

For years, the Mass. Cultural Council bumbled along doing great work, but in a humble and bureaucratic manner with a boring logo and a seeming inability or reluctance to create a real brand. Then, along came Anita Walker, the woman, I predict, who will do more for arts education than anyone before her in this Commonwealth. A native Californian, Walker is the real deal—if she isn't dragged down by the cautious, play-it-safe crowd.

Walker grew up in La Cañada Flintridge, a small town between Pasadena and Glendale. She seems like one of the high-school heroines from American Graffiti: innocent in a funny way, and smart. She went 900 miles away to attend college in Idaho, then transferred to the University of Arizona. I believe in the accidental nature of life. And accidents took her to Le Mars, Iowa. There she pursued a media career, beginning as a TV weatherwoman. ("It's not like print journalism; it doesn't matter what you say; it's lost in the ozone.... The first truth of weather reporting: Don't tell people what's doing if you haven't looked outside.") Her husband, Klark, was a reporter at the station.

The couple moved to Palm Beach, but she was drawn back to Iowa to start the state's first TV show devoted strictly to business. Then Walker was chosen to run the Iowa Arts Council, which she directed for five years before being tapped in a nationwide search to oversee the Mass. Cultural Council. I apologize for putting her into another movie metaphor, but, in her enthusiasm for education and the arts, she also summons up Mickey Rooney and Judy Garland saying, "Hey, kids, let's put on a show!"

Walker is just starting to appreciate the three things that define Boston: sports, politics and revenge—foreign-seeming concepts to innocent new arrivals. Indeed, she was shocked by my saying that revenge was an emotional hallmark of this town. Her sunny optimism blows right through that attitude. She's the Salvation Army lass from the musical Guys and Dolls, trying to reform the gambler, which is Boston. Here are some of Walker's comments as the leading arts advocate in the state:

1). "I'm a Gemini, both sides of the coin. I want to have a vision for the future, to have us be entrepreneurial about arts education. But I need to know how things work at the state level. When I get on an airplane, I need to know how it works. I want to know how government works here."

2). "I don't want to go to the State House with 'My car's falling apart.' I want to tell them, 'My engine is great. Here's how it can be better.'"

3). "Don't whine. Make a case for strategic planning."

4). "Be full of wonder. This state is so rich—can you imagine visiting Paul Revere's house? And seeing the gritty authenticity of New Bedford. I'm like a kid in a candy store."

5). "I went to Washington recently to lobby for this state. Here's the premise: All of us in America have a stake in Massachusetts. It's where our cultural heritage began. We're the stewards of our history. Take it seriously."

6). "I keep a notebook on trends in life: movies, books, demographics, the good, the bad and the ugly. It's part of my job to focus on 'What are people thinking? And how can we serve them in interesting, provocative ways?'"

7). "Endless curiosity is key in life. Exploring other cultures in our state, thinking about the world in diverse ways... who we are—that's what I want to emphasize here in arts education."

8). "Watch the movies of Alfred Hitchcock if you want a taste of intelligence and style."

9). "Never live the vanilla life."

My advice, if you're in business or government: Invite Anita Walker to dinner. It will help work both sides of your brain. ***

ON BECKETT, BRADY, BALKING AND BÉLA KÁROLYI

5 RANDOM THOUGHTS ON THE SOX

(U2 hook) He feels numb... We need a healthy Josh Beckett. In fact, there's not a player on this team whose health is more important. Is Lester legit? No doubt. Can Dice-K get it done? Of course. But when the playoffs roll around, only one guy is going to instill the fear of God in any team he faces. And it's not Javier Lopez.

But Tek's still healthy... Injuries are running buck wild in the AL East. With the Yankees already KO'd, that only leaves the Rays and Sox to stumble around like it's the end of a Rocky fight. Ultimately, this division might just go to whoever has the deeper team. We like the Sox's chances, especially if they finally heed our advice and activate the Living Legend—Johnny Pesky.

They're farm animals!... Speaking of Sox/Rays, Tampa's team has a rep built on sound drafting and smooth minor-league grooming, while the Sox only dish out big contracts and eat babies. But check this out: Take Tampa's top-10 batters and 10 best pitchers, and you'll only find five homegrown players. Do the same with the Sox, and the count's nine. Boom! Now that's how you debate!

Power Outage... At press time, the Red Sox had lost only a game-and-a-half in the standings since the Manny trade. That's not great, but it's pretty remarkable considering that during that period JD Drew, Mike Lowell and David Ortiz are a combined 32 for 139 (.230) with four homers. Meanwhile, Manuel's got six dongs all by his douchey little self in L.A.

AA Battering... The Sox had no choice but to send Clay Buchholz all the way back to Double A Portland. And while it's far too early to give up on Clay, it seems likely that his career might have peaked after two performances. He's this millennium's Macaulay Culkin.

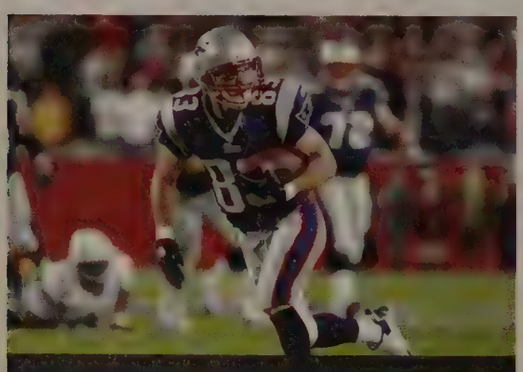
4 Ideas For London in 2012

Béla TV: The TV in Béla Károlyi's bedroom could be permanently stuck on the Pummel Horse Channel, and we doubt he'd ever notice. The man (more like, The Man) just loves team gymnastics. Give Béla his own mat-side camera-crew for every event in 2012 and the ratings will soar past any Michael Phelps race.

Drunk Gymnastics: The rules are identical. Contestants attempt the same moves, at the same speed and with the same level of reckless abandon. Only this time they take six shots of Jameson before hitting the mat. If we're playing these games in England, participants must be 18 to compete. Or in the case of the Chinese women's team... seven.

The Underwater Swim: In London, we'll all be watching swimming like crazy again, so why not have some fun with it? Competitors dive into the pool and race four lengths completely underwater. For every breath they take—but not every move they make—they get Tasered. We smell another gold medal!

The Joust: Scratch equestrian events and train those horses for something useful. Knightly jousting is undeniably the coolest Olympic sport not in existence. Not only would the jousters become national heroes, but think of the horses! How about a U.S. Olympic equine squad of Big Brown, Smarty Jones and the ghost of Barbaro? That's the real dream team.



2 OBSERVATIONS ON THE PATRIOTS PRESEASON

Oh no! It's his other foot!?!... There hasn't been a more ridiculed Patriot this preseason than Matt Cassel, which is pretty funny. It's like going to a movie and complaining about one of the extras. But here's how we see it: Do the Patriots have to stress out over Brady's backup? Yes. But do WE? Absolutely not. Who are the Patriots without Brady anyway?

One shining moment... We found happiness in one small, albeit random, play during that preseason mess down in Tampa. Second quarter, third and two, in Tampa territory—Wes Welker goes in motion, slips into a pocket in the D, makes the catch, and spins and flops for seven yards. That one never gets old. And thank God, because we'll see it another 100 or so times before February.

1 ONE DATE TO WATCH

Sept. 7: That's when it all starts. That's when the true Redeem Team—the 2008 Pats—takes the field (for real) for the first time this year. It doesn't matter that they're playing the Chiefs—easily the most vanilla team in the NFL. The world's just a better place when "The Sweatshirt" is holding court in Foxborough.

3 WORST FENWAY FAN TENDENCIES

Losers on the left... Walking to your seats at Fenway is about as fun as opening a plastic electronics carton. We're all miserable. We're all getting pushed. So for the sake of the Nation, don't be the guy who walks against the traffic on the left side. Without rules, we have nothing. Plus, you almost made us spill our beer.

Down in front!... We agree. There are times at Fenway when everyone should just sit down, but the "Down in front!" epidemic needs to be stopped. Yes, we know, you paid "good money" for those seats, but $125 doesn't buy the right to transform Fenway into your living room. Take it easy, Stalin.

Booing at balks... Let's be honest. There's like a 20 percent chance you actually know what a balk is, and even if you do, we doubt you could see the movement from your seats up in the stratosphere of the Budweiser Deck.

Soroff On JULIAN KUERTI

The BSO's virtuoso conductor discusses quantum physics, baton grilling and Spanish knife fights.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA assistant conductor Julian Kuerti came to the job last year at the age of 30. This summer, with artistic director James Levine sidelined by health problems, Kuerti has stepped up to the podium. Born in Toronto, he's the son of world-renowned pianist Anton Kuerti and cellist Kristine Bogyo. He completed an honors degree in engineering and physics at the University of Toronto while performing as concertmaster and soloist with various orchestras. Kuerti has studied his art form at the University of Toronto, the prestigious Pierre Monteux School for Conductors and the University of Arts in Berlin. He has conducted throughout Europe and the Americas.

Jonathan Soroff: So your parents are famous musicians. Did you really have any choice?

Julian Kuerti: I did. They didn't want me to be a musician. They said, "Look, it's so difficult. Do something else unless this is the only thing you can." So I tried it: engineering and quantum physics. But I ended up wanting to do music.

Any similarity between music and physics?
I think there is. Music is an art form that takes place in time. You're distributing sound within time, and in physics, what you're trying to do is describe the world through time. To come up with an equation, a way of thinking of the physical world, that relates to time. So time is the constant between the two of them.

Solo artist you're dying to work with?
There are so many, it's really hard to name just one, but I'm really happy to be working with Leon Fleisher, because he's been so influential and such an unbelievable inspiration to generations of pianists.

Can you whistle?
Sure. [Demonstrates.]

Which would you rather read: a score or a good book?
If it's a score I don't know, I'd much rather the score.

Do you really need a baton to conduct?
You don't need anything. People do it with their eyebrows.

But you use a baton?
Depends on the music. Sometimes I feel I have much more control and a fine touch with a baton, but other times, I just like to get in with my hands.

Have you done anything unconventional with your baton?
[Laughs.] I once used my baton to skewer some vegetables and roast them on a barbecue. But I didn't conduct with it after.

Is your baton bigger than others?
That's a very personal question. I'd like to think that mine is of the length that I feel comfortable handling.

Favorite composer to conduct?
Whoever I'm working on at the moment. I sort of immerse myself in their world and they turn into my favorite.

What's in heavy rotation on your iPod right now?
I've got two iPods. One has some Bach and Brahms' Third Symphony.

How about pop music?
I'm not that well versed in it, but the people I love to listen to are the oldies and the goodies—Led Zeppelin, the Beatles, Jimi Hendrix. I love Radiohead, Björk.

Do you believe in ghosts?
Absolutely. My mother saw one, and I believe her. I've never seen one, but they've been known to live in my apartment in Berlin.

Do you have any rituals or superstitions before you go on stage?
I try not to get into that because I'm afraid that if I do, I might miss one time and it'll give me anxiety.

Do you get anxious before taking the podium?
I actually get sleepy.

Are all conductors control freaks?
No question. The nature of the profession is that we have to be, because in the end, if you're not, and you leave too much up to the musicians or chance, you end up with something that doesn't reflect your vision or artistic unity.

Physically, how demanding is conducting?
Very. It's a lot of cardio, and you can't forget to breathe.

Biggest difference between working with an orchestra in Europe and here?
In Europe, the players expect you to be a little more in their face and demanding. In America, you have to assume that they know what you want from them and just sort of nudge them in that direction. That's also a function of the fact that in Europe, the players come to a first rehearsal so unbelievably unprepared that you're actually teaching them the music.

I heard you were once held by knifepoint by angry waiters in Mallorca.
[Laughs.] True. When the bill came, it was at least five times the amount it should have been, so I tried to negotiate, and a waiter became very aggressive and pulled a knife. I grabbed it out of his hand, and a woman behind the bar grabbed it from me so no one would get hurt, and then the waiter punched me in the face. Eventually the police came, but they were corrupt, so they took the side of the waiters and we each had to pay something like 150 euros to exit the restaurant.

Any interest or plans to compose?
I do write music now and then, but it never gets played. What I really want to do is conduct.

Single most important trait of a great conductor?
Being able to convince everybody else that you know what you're doing.

How do you do that?
Any way you can. You have to beg, threaten, charm, or anything necessary to get things to sound the way you want them to.

How much of a perfectionist are you?
It's a defining trait.

Isn't it odd having people pay lots of money to stare at your ass while you're working?
I don't have to look at them. ✖✖✖

Fashion Fallout

From chunky knits to gothic glam, our favorite looks for the season.

By Ruth Basloe
Photographs by Kim Kennedy

Fur-ocious

An unfinished, furry jacket or vest like this faux one adds a fierce touch to any outfit.

Vest, $70 at Zara. Dress, $1,995 at Donna Karan. Ioannilani bracelet ($445 at Barneys New York. Belt ($25 at Urban Outfitters.

Haute Hippie

Summer's boho-chic look gets a '70s, rock 'n' roll makeover for fall.

Dress, $6,095; belt, $495; and shoes, $1,195. All at Gucci.

Chunky Style

Supersized knits pair perfectly with more refined pieces.

Sweater, $450, and dress, $345 Both at DKNY. 3.1 Phillip Lim bag, $475 at Barneys New York. Hat, $24 at Urban Outfitters

Tonal Range

Rich gem colors ruled the runways. To usher in the season, wear several of these warm, autumnal shades together.

Burberry Prorsum coat, $2,695; pants, $1,395; hat, $295; gloves, $295; and necklace, $1,995. All at Burberry.

Lacy Lady

Forget the doily. Updated lace appears in smart, unfussy shapes like button-down shirts and pencil skirts.

Prada top, $1,080; skirt, $1,420; and sweater, $795. All at Barneys New York. Christian Louboutin shoes, $785 at Neiman Marcus.

Well-Suited

Retro skirt-suits return. While we love the arms-wear–inspired tailoring, it's still nice to dress like a lady.

Jacket: $2,955; skirt: $1,000; gloves: $450; and sunglasses: $295. All at Christian Dior. Loeffler Randall shoes: $425 at Louis Boston.

Into the Woods

Mix delicate buds with fall florals and woodsy prints

Jean Paul Gaultier dress, $1,895, and Tracy Watts hat, $325. Both at Barneys New York. Burberry Prorsum gloves, $295 at Burberry.

Keeping Up With Kapoor

PUZZLING PERCEPTIONS

With only 14 pieces, the Institute of Contemporary Art's retrospective of Anish Kapoor's work sounds more like a mere moment than a celebration of his 15-plus-year career. Until you see it. Kapoor's larger-than-life installations use shining metals and resin in fluid forms to perplex the viewer and eliminate a sense of beginning and end. You might remember Kapoor for the massive metal bean currently squashing a good portion of Chicago's Millenium Park, but it's his new giant ball of red wax, titled "Past, Present, Future," that has the tongues of Bostonians and international art aficionados wagging in unison. Kapoor's crazy contours have been on display in the West gallery of the ICA since May, but come Sept. 7 the exhibit will be packing up. Artistic movement, indeed.

KYLE WRIGHT

Anish Kapoor: Past, Present, Future on display at the Institute of Contemporary Art through Sept. 7, $10-$12, Tue., Wed., Sat. and Sun. 10 am-5 pm, Thu[illegible] Fri. 10 am-9 pm, icaboston.org.

Chekhov Your List

Flock to Seagull

A group of strangers gathers at a house, romantic entanglements ensue and ridiculous arguments follow. It's like Real World: 19th-Century Russia. With an original translation by director Diego Arciniegas, Anton Chekhov's The Seagull gets remixed at the Publick Theatre Boston Sept. 3–7. It has all the essentials of a dark comedy: unrequited love, feelings of regret, a dead bird. Just don't hold your breath for any jacuzzi hookups. Lindsay Scalera

American Teen ★ This isn't the worst movie of the year, but it's certainly the most dishonest. Director Nanette Burstein ignores just about every ethical guideline dividing theatrical documentary from reality TV. Following a handful of students in a lily-white Warsaw, Ind., high school, Burstein mercilessly manipulates her footage so that these bland young kids conform to simplistic stereotypes that were already stale when John Hughes made The Breakfast Club. There's a stink of suspicion hanging over most of their emotional outbursts and tidy story arcs, so we can only wonder how many of these shenanigans were staged for the audience's benefit and how much of the teens' behavior was altered due to a noisy camera crew following them around. Entire sequences are awkwardly dubbed over with dialogue cribbed from other occasions, and keeping an eye out for costumes and settings reveals a blatantly fudged timeline. It's like an episode of the The Hills, guest starring unattractive kids. (At Harvard Square and Waltham Embassy.)

The Dark Knight ★★★ ½ Astoundingly ambitious, The Dark Knight is summer blockbuster as dialectical exercise. It's a philosophical debate among agents of order and chaos, punctuated with the spectacle of a depressed billionaire in flying-rodent drag beating up a psychotic clown. Preoccupied, as most of us have been for the past seven years, with how far one must go to combat an inexplicable enemy, the film wrestles with so many meaty ideas and timely concerns, you can't quite wrap your head around it all in just one viewing. As the Joker, Heath Ledger's final completed performance is the sort of roiling, balls-to-the-wall turn from which legends are made. And director Christopher Nolan ruthlessly whittles every interaction down to the barest of essentials. Yet, he cuts so quickly in and out of scenes we hardly have time to absorb vital information. The film might be too aggressive and propulsive for its own good. It's about a half-hour of breathing room away from the masterpiece it yearns to be. (At Boston Common, Fenway and in the suburbs.)

Encounters at the End of the World ★★★ After 40-odd years and 50-something films, Werner Herzog has investigated almost every obscure corner of the globe, so naturally his latest masterpiece sends him all the way to Antarctica. Turning his inquisitive gaze and persnickety voice-over narration on the residents of McMurdo Station, a tacky American outpost "complete with abominations like yoga classes," Herzog salutes the vagabond spirits exploring the bottom edge of the map. The director's voracious sampling of their research conjures a thriving ecosystem. We hear seals wailing what sound like Pink Floyd solos and savor some jaw-dropping underwater photography (by frequent Herzog collaborator Henry Kaiser), before finally standing on the edge of an active volcano. The title is double-edged, as all involved take a dim view of the planet's long-term prospects. But somehow Herzog's reverence for every last sign of life feels weirdly joyous and hopeful. This movie is an astounding, eye-opening experience. (At Coolidge Corner and in the suburbs.)

Hamlet 2 ★★ ½ You've heard of a comedy of embarrassment, now get ready for a comedy of abject mortification. For whatever reason, British superstar Steve Coogan has yet to score much traction in the States, but that should change after this erratic, eventually hilarious farce. Coogan stars as a shameless high-school drama teacher who pens an ill-advised sequel to Shakespeare's masterpiece in the hopes of salvaging his school's endangered theatre program. He gets more than he bargained for once word of his production's tacky blasphemy reaches the media. (The short version: Jesus Christ borrows his dad's time machine in order to rescue all the characters that died at the end of Hamlet.)

Director Andrew Fleming tends to err on the side of volume, blowing up jokes a few sizes larger than they need to be. But this weakness becomes a strength once the curtain rises on the play itself, a gaudy craptacular of such epic tastelessness that it alone is worth the price of admission. The final reel redeems a lot of early sins. (At Boston Common, Fenway and in the suburbs.)

Hancock ★★ ½ Will Smith stars as the title character, a drunken amnesiac superhero who flies around downtown Los Angeles fighting crime while wasted and knocks over a lot of expensive stuff. Like buildings. Hancock's such a shambling wreck, he can't even take flight without leaving massive divots in the street beneath him, which in this litigious day and age naturally makes him the plaintiff in a ton of property damage suits. So far, so funny, and as director Peter Berg's pricey blockbuster is content being Bad Santa with superpowers, the movie zings. Alas, Hancock pivots on one game-changing plot-twist that makes it impossible for me to discuss anything further. The movie jumps clear off the rails, going all kerflooey in ways everybody can nitpick, but only a bastard would tell. It's too bad, as the movie

A WILD BUNCH

The Harvard Film Archive celebrates Sam Peckinpah's work.

Sam Peckinpah: Blood Poet
A film series running at the Harvard Film Archive Sept. 5–12.

GENIUS. DRUNK. Misogynist. Visionary. Fascist. Hero. Legend. Fraud. Prick. Sam Peckinpah's been called every name in the book—usually by his friends.

Nearly 25 years after a death accelerated by the kind of substance abuse you only read about in rock-star biographies, he's still lionized and ostracized in equal measure. Before Peckinpah died in 1984, his reputation was so toxic that the only legit job he could land was directing Julian Lennon's music videos.

But time has a funny way of settling scores, and now this towering figure on the cinematic landscape—to me, the greatest of all American filmmakers—is receiving a retrospective at the Harvard Film Archive. If you love movies, you need to be there.

Peckinpah's name has become critical shorthand in any discussion of screen violence—with good reason. A scant two years after Arthur Penn's Bonnie and Clyde rocked a nation with its climactic slow-motion massacre, Peckinpah emptied auditoriums with The Wild Bunch,

STELLA ARTOIS

Perfection HAS ITS PLACE

A perfectly poured Stella Artois is the Gold Standard of Belgian beer.

Step One THE PURIFICATION

The bartender selects the signature glass for the beer being poured. The glass is scrubbed in a cool-water bath, preferably with a mild detergent. It's then rinsed with cold water to chill the glass.

Step Two THE SACRIFICE

The tap is opened in one swift motion to let the first burst of foam flow away. It must never enter the glass, thus ensuring every drop of beer is fresh.

Step Three THE LIQUID ALCHEMY

The glass is held at a 45-degree angle to create the perfect balance of liquid to foam.

Step Four THE HEAD

The head is created by straightening and lowering the glass. The foam is visually appealing and releases the beer's aroma.

Step Five THE REMOVAL

The bartender closes the tap in one quick action and moves the glass away from the faucet to ensure no drops spoil the perfect head.

Step Six THE BEHEADING

While the beer is flowing over the edge of the glass, the bartender cuts the head gently with a head cutter at a 45-degree angle. This eliminates the larger bubbles that burst easily and accelerate the dissipation of the head.

Step Seven THE JUDGMENT

The bartender now stands in judgment. The beer's head should be two fingers thick.

Step Eight THE CLEANSING

The bartender then rinses the bottom and sides of the glass. This keeps the glass clean and cool and makes it comfortable to hold.

Step Nine THE BESTOWAL

A perfectly poured pint of Belgian beer is presented with the logos of the coaster and glass facing the customer.

which featured altering film-speeds and spurting geysers of blood that transformed mayhem into a savage ballet.

But unlike the glossy aestheticized bloodshed that's now too often delivered to an unquestioning audience, Peckinpah's violence is still visceral. Ghastly death spasms cause irreparable damage to the perpetrators in addition to the victims—not to mention the viewers. These are troubling, questioning films.

It's a testament to the enduring power of such images that The Wild Bunch's 25th anniversary theatrical re-release was delayed for almost a year as the MPAA tried slapping it with an NC-17 rating.

Of course, Peckinpah had more to offer than just brutality, and the HFA shrewdly acknowledges the filmmaker's gentler side by showing his gorgeous 1962 elegiac tone poem Ride the High Country, the sweet 1972 Steve McQueen rodeo comedy Junior Bonner and 1966's rarely screened TV movie Noon Wine, starring Jason Robards.

But the title of this series is "Blood Poet," so the opening night show is the notorious, 1974 mindblower Bring Me the Head of Alfredo Garcia, which for Peckinpah newbies might be like jumping out of an airplane without a parachute when you're already afraid of heights.

This grisly masterpiece stars the inimitable Warren Oates as scummy, south-of-the-border piano player Bennie Benjamin. (Try picturing an uncool Tom Waits in oversized shades, and you've got the basic idea.) When a Mexican crime boss puts a million-dollar price tag on the decapitated head of the henchman who impregnated his only daughter, Bennie finds himself competing against well-heeled gringo bounty hunters and local ruffians. The bullets fly with abandon all over this increasingly surreal landscape as everyone jockeys for that sticky burlap sack containing the prized cargo.

It's a perverse, deliberately off-putting film rocked by jarring tonal shifts and sicko comic flourishes. Were it possible for a movie to smell bad, this one would. Postcoital pillow talk culminates in Bennie picking crabs out of his pubic hair, and the shootouts are punctuated by weird background imagery, like an American businessman nodding in approval at a Time magazine cover story on Richard Nixon while underage prostitutes wash his feet.

Eventually, the film grows into something of a twisted buddy-movie, as Bennie bonds in one-way conversations with the rotting head he affectionately calls Al. Almost uniformly despised at the time, Bring Me the Head of Alfredo Garcia was nonetheless championed from the get-go by one young upstart critic from Chicago. His name: Roger Ebert.

But the real treasure of this HFA series arrives the following night, with a rare chance to watch the unabridged version of Peckinpah's final Western, Pat Garrett and Billy the Kid, a movie that in 1973 was savagely critiqued by a studio boss who claimed that "no Western should run longer than 90 minutes."

Seen in its full breadth and scope, the film ranks second only to The Wild Bunch on the list of Peckinpah's formidable achievements. Taking a glum view familiar to fans of HBO's lamented Deadwood, the Wild West gets worse as big business marches in and starts killing people with government-sanctioned impunity.

The movie follows James Coburn's Pat Garrett as he forsakes his outlaw ways and dons a badge for cattle baron John Chisum and New Mexico governor Lew Wallace (chillingly played by Jason Robards), who assume that Garrett is the only man who can deliver Billy the Kid to justice—preferably on a slab.

Almost uniformly despised at the time, Bring Me the Head of Alfredo Garcia was nonetheless championed from the get-go by one young upstart critic from Chicago. His name: Roger Ebert.

Cast in hilariously unsubtle terms, Billy is portrayed as a preening rock star by Kris Kristofferson, and his entourage consists of similarly mangy members of the singer's touring band, plus one mysterious vagabond named Alias (soundtrack composer Bob Dylan).

Scripted by cult novelist Rudy Wurlitzer, Pat Garrett and Billy the Kid is melancholy, especially when Peckinpah works over the iconography of the Old West by positioning beloved character actors from B-pictures past as cannon fodder on Coburn's long drunken journey towards self-annihilation. (His final gunshot is into a mirror.)

The most moving, lyrical death in Western history finds legend Slim Pickens gutshot and wandering down by a riverside, basking in one last moment of serenity amid the strains of Dylan's "Knockin' on Heaven's Door."

Eventually Coburn runs out of icons to blow away and has no choice but to stagger toward Billy the Kid's abode. As Dylan's magnificent, largely instrumental score builds to a crescendo, Garrett faces off with a surly undertaker played in a ghostly turn by Peckinpah himself. In his first and final performance in front of the camera, the director stares us down and asks: "When are you gonna learn you can't trust anybody? Not even yourself."

It's a question that resonates through almost every picture he made. ✖✖✖ marks another impressive attempt by Smith to push the boundaries of his affable screen persona. (At Boston Common and in the suburbs.)

Hellboy II: The Golden Army ★★ ½ There's no shortage of fanciful creatures in director Guillermo Del Toro's sequel to his modest 2004 adaptation of Mike Mignola's comic book. Once again following Ron Perlman's crabby, cigar-smoking demon-spawn on another mission to save humankind from the malevolent whims of the netherworld, this visually extravagant sequel is so densely packed with monsters it sometimes feels like the cantina scene from Star Wars dragged out to feature length. If only the story, by Del Toro and Mignola, were half as sophisticated as the production design. There's too much sitcom squabbling from Perlman and his flammable squeeze (Selma Blair) as a huge ensemble cast jockeys for screen time. Del Toro has a contagious affinity for his misfits and weirdos, and the movie's highlight finds a heartbroken Hellboy and his fishy sidekick Abe having a drunken Barry Manilow sing-along. But the stakes feel all too low, with too many jokey digressions, leading to a fatal lack of urgency in the overly bombastic, effects-laden third act. (In the suburbs.)

The Last Mistress ★★★ Talk about a match made in heaven. First we've got French feminist provocateur Catherine Breillat, director of lurid, Rorschach-tests such as Romance and Fat Girl. Breillat was probably destined to team up with Asia Argento, a carnal, fearless actress who has proven in films like Scarlet Diva and The Heart Is Deceitful Above All Things that she has no concept of boundaries. The shocker here is that, for a healthy chunk of its running time, The Last Mistress is deceptively tasteful, beginning as a refined, 19th-century costume drama about an aspiring aristocrat (Fu'ad Ait Aattou) negotiating to marry a virginal beauty (Roxane Mesquida). But watch out once Argento shows up as Aattou's ferocious Spanish mistress. Their entanglement is a sexually charged doom-spiral, one made fascinating by Argento's wailing, unhinged performance. She's a literal bloodsucker, grunting and writhing her way through scenes to spellbinding effect. (In the suburbs.)

Mamma Mia! ★ ½ I guess there's something to be said for the unabashed lack of inhibition displayed by these actors. And this slovenly adaptation of the long-running jukebox musical is nothing if not high-spirited; in fact, few major motion pictures feel so much like drunken karaoke parties. But the trouble is that stage director Phyllida Lloyd has been placed at the helm without understanding how movies work. The performances are all broader than barn doors, and the camera zigzags in every direction without ever landing in the right place. Pay no attention to the cheeky paternity plotline; it's all just a thin pretext for our stars to bellow ABBA tunes, the majority of which have no connection to what's happening onscreen. The discombobulated choreography reeks of amateur hour, and Meryl Streep gives it her all, which is frankly too much by half. Still, she fares better than costar Pierce Brosnan, whose agonized vocal bleats sound like the death throes of a freshly slaughtered yak. (At Boston Common, Fenway and in the suburbs.)

Man on Wire ★★★ ½ Funny how the most exciting heist picture in ages turns out to be a documentary. Director James Marsh's artfully crafted, edge-of-your-seat adventure tells the tale of tightrope walker Philipe Petit, who one morning in 1974 danced on a high-wire between the World Trade Center's Twin Towers. Combining hyperbolically shot reenactments and stunning archival footage with the gregarious reminiscences of Petit and his band of coconspirators, Marsh lays out the elaborate break-in with the snap precision and cinematic verve of a Danny Ocean caper. All the more poignant for never once mentioning 9/11, the movie uses old photographs to let the majestic towers speak for themselves, which lends Man On Wire a shade of sorrow the filmmaker is wise enough not to push. Petit is a florid and quixotic interview subject perfectly in sync with the film's evocation of the anything-goes paradise that was New York City in the 1970s. The breathtaking climax triggers many contradictory emotions as Petit's stunt was so reckless, so foolish and so magical. (At Kendall Square and Waltham Embassy.)

Pineapple Express ★★★ Cheech and Chong meets Tango and Cash in this zonked riff on Reagan-era buddy comedies from the Superbad writing team of Seth Rogen and Evan Goldberg. Rogen stars as a slacker process server who accidentally stumbles into a crooked-cop drug war. Seeking refuge at the pad of his gleefully addled pot dealer (a revelatory James Franco), Rogen is mistaken for a world-class hitman, which prompts all sorts of wild car chases and narrow escapes for these two gloriously inept heroes. Directed by art-house favorite David Gordon Green, Pineapple Express has a grand time goofing on 1980s action-movie iconography, even boasting a brand-new theme song by Huey Lewis and the News! The kick here is watching familiar formulas subverted because our protagonists are baked out of their skulls. Like most Judd Apatow productions, this one's a bit too willing to follow the performers along improvised tangents, but a fundamental sweetness carries the day. (At Boston Common, Fenway and in the suburbs.)

Sex and the City ★ ½ A telling early shot finds Sarah Jessica Parker and friends with their noses smushed up against the display case of a $50,000 diamond ring, thus setting the tone for the following 135 minutes of covetous consumption. With five costume changes, even the opening credits are a parade of product placements. Calling the film light on plot would be generous. Carrie and Miranda are treated shabbily by longtime loves, so they spend an entire calendar year ignoring apologies and wallowing in self-pity while Charlotte and Samantha drop by for drinks. Meanwhile, there are fashions, labels and lavish living spaces. Luxury porn and brand-name loyalty haven't been this fetishized since American Psycho. Inexplicably longer than Letters From Iwo Jima, Sex and the City leaves you feeling sorry for these shallow women and their empty, avaricious lives. (At Harvard Square and in the suburbs.)

Star Wars: The Clone Wars ★ Stinky the Hutt? Seriously? Hopefully concluding the process of diminishment that began in the '90s with "Special Editions" of the original trilogy and continued with the misbegotten prequels, George Lucas offers one final insult to anyone who grew up playing with fake light sabers. This soulless cash-grab is actually the first three episodes of an upcoming Cartoon Network series ineptly stitched together and tossed onto the big screen where the cheap animation and tinny music come off worse than even Darth George could have imagined. The garbled plot is late-model Lucas nonsense about trade route negotiations and baffling blockades. Jabba the Hutt's son Stinky is kidnapped by Sith Lords for strategic purposes, and if the flatulent baby slug isn't off-putting enough, turns out Jabba's also got a gay uncle with a Truman Capote lisp. Looks like childhood is officially over, boys and girls; we don't have to care about Star Wars anymore. (At Boston Common, Fenway and in the suburbs.)

Transsiberian ★★ Director Brad Anderson has Hitchcockian aspirations but no technique to get him there in this snoozy thriller set on a Moscow-bound train. Emily Mortimer stars as a fragile ex-junkie tempted by the tall, dark and handsome Eduardo Noriega while her clueless born-again Christian husband (Woody Harrelson) blithely babbles on about his weird railway fixation. The makings of a prickly relationship drama sour upon the arrival of drug-stuffed Russian nesting dolls and another ridiculously accented, comically overblown Ben Kingsley performance. Mortimer does fine and Harrelson is exceptional as always, but the movie is listless, recycling secondhand thriller tropes without an ounce of originality or excitement. Even when it's preposterous, Transsiberian isn't any fun. Anderson is a local favorite thanks to flicks like Next Stop Wonderland and the Danvers-shot Session 9, but the flat functionality of his body of work is starting to suggest a chameleon-like ability to be dull in all genres. (At Harvard Square and West Newton Cinema.)

Tropic Thunder ★★★ Ben Stiller's scabrous Hollywood satire misses about as often as it hits, so it's good those hits are vicious. Sending up the absurd egomania of Tinseltown's elite, the flick follows a handful of prima donnas on an ill-fated attempt to infuse a tacky Vietnam War epic with method-acting madness. Stiller is merely adequate as a musclebound action hero seeking artistic credibility, but the character's misguided attempt to woo Academy voters by portraying a mentally challenged, buck-toothed stutterer named Simple Jack might be the best skewering of Oscar pandering ever filmed. Equally audacious is Robert Downey Jr.'s transcendent turn as a pompous Australian playing an African-American GI. There's no way the bit should work, but Downey is such a magician it's somehow charming. Less successful are one-note mug-a-thons from Jack Black and Tom Cruise, and the movie's wobbly structure exposes Stiller's sketch comedy roots. But whenever Tropic Thunder lands a blow, it hurts. (At Boston Common, Fenway and in the suburbs.)

Vicky Cristina Barcelona ★★ ½ Though problematic and slightly sloppy, this pleasant trifle is Woody Allen's most consistent effort since 1999's loopy La Strada remake, Sweet and Lowdown. Rebecca Hall and Scarlett Johansson star as Vicky and Cristina, American postgrads spending a summer in Spain. Enter Javier Bardem's free-spirited Latin lover and stock stereotype, who probably would be risible if played by any other actor. Bardem delivers his loosest, goofiest performance yet, embracing the role's mildewed clichés with contagious delight. Romantic entanglements and disentanglements ensue, complicated by stomach ulcers, girl-girl crushes and ill-advised rushes to the altar. The most fun comes from Bardem's ex-wife, a lusty psycho played in a movie-stealing turn by Penélope Cruz. Allen's direction is perkier and more alert than his recent work; he even moves the camera once in a while, soaking up the Barcelona scenery and gazing adoringly on his good-looking cast. Modest in both aim and accomplishment, it's hardly a return to form, but it'll do. (At Boston Common, Coolidge Corner, Kendall Square and Waltham Embassy.)

The Wackness ★★★ This wistful nostalgia piece is set in the summer of 1994 during the waning days of New York City's funky bohemian rot, right as Giuliani started turning Manhattan into an antiseptic playground for billionaires. Former Nickelodeon star Josh Peck comes of age as a melancholy teenage weed dealer, working Washington Square Park and falling hard for Olivia Thirlby's bored little rich girl. But the film is stolen outright by Ben Kingsley playing her dysfunctional step-dad, a regular customer of Peck's who's hell-bent on turning his midlife crisis into a rowdy second childhood. Kingsley's natural tendencies towards hammy overacting are for once justified, as his character constantly ingests massive amounts of drugs. Often reminiscent of American Beauty, only absent the holier-than-thou moralizing, this sweet and evocative effort from writer/director Jonathan Levine never quite transcends the clichés of the "summer that changed my life" template. But where else can you watch a doped up Gandhi hooking up with Mary-Kate Olsen? (At Coolidge Corner and Kendall Square.)

Wall-E ★★★★ Here's one for the ages. The crowning achievement from Pixar Animation Studios depicts a ruined Earth, some seven hundred years in the future, where a lonely trash compactor sorts his way through mountains of garbage, his only friend a remarkably resilient cockroach. Owing more to Charlie Chaplin than Bugs Bunny, the staggering early reels of Wall-E are devoid of any dialogue, working in a language of pure visual expression and brilliant soundscapes by Star Wars guru Ben Burtt. The lovesick travails of our adorable title character are as moving as any movie I've seen. In the second half, director Andrew Stanton switches gears into a less lyrical, more aggressively satirical mode, and introduces us to a future of overfed coach potatoes stranded in space after wrecking our planet. It's a pretty savage social commentary, but I was more interested in Wall-E and Eve, his shiny iPod-looking babe who packs a mean phaser and enlists a cuckoo's nest of malfunctioning robots to help save us all from bad programming. It's an instant classic. (At Boston Common, Fenway and in the suburbs.)

The X-Files: I Want to Believe ★ It's been six years since the TV series slumped off screens in shame (and probably twice as long since anybody cared), but Mulder and Scully are trotted out once again for a morose, low-stakes slog that owes more to modern forensic procedurals than to the duo's groundbreaking paranormal adventures. Who even wants to believe that there's a gay veterinarian living in the woods, kidnapping young women and using their body parts to keep his husband's severed head alive? Writer/director Chris Carter's glacially paced effort recycles cramped, ugly sets and is unable to wring any suspense from the nonsensical premise. David Duchovny mumbles the usual monologues while Gillian Anderson just looks unhappy to be there. Their famous sexual tension has dissolved into long-winded arguments by a boring old couple who don't even seem to like each other anymore. This is the dullest, most incompetently assembled thriller of the summer. And remember, I've seen The Happening. (At Boston Common.)

James pushes the envelope in a stirring return.

James
plays the Paradise Rock Club Sept. 14 and 15.

AMERICAN ROCK FANS only tend to remember the English band James for 1993's "Laid," a strum-happy march where frontman Tim Booth sang about gender roles and sexual positions, riding the words "pretty" and "lady" in his frisky falsetto. That hit was the title track of a transcendent album produced by Brian Eno in the decade between his similar reformations of U2 and Coldplay, acts that share James' spiritual optimism.

Most of those fans are clearly unaware that "Laid" graced the middle of a 20-year career that took root in Manchester—with Smiths head Morrissey declaring James "the best band in the world"—and finally fell apart in 2001. "We had two or three years of total dysfunction," Booth says. "I wasn't going back unless relationships improved."

Now it's time for second chances. And while bands from the Pixies to the Police have reunited in three- or four-piece form, James is back with all seven original members, including trumpeter Andy Diagram, who left before Laid.

"We definitely believed we were finished for good and it gave us a good break, but we're back in quite a fiery form and having a fantastic time," says Booth, whose band launches a U.S. tour Sept. 14 and 15 at the Paradise, a tiny venue for a group that headlines arenas back home. "And we're trying to move forward with improved music to what we've done in the past, which I don't think anyone else is doing or anyone really thinks is possible."

Indeed, James is raising its ambitions—and breaking from much of the reunion pack—with Hey Ma, a bold new CD that hits stores the day after the Paradise shows. Its 11 songs were culled from 120 pieces that Booth, bassist Jim Glennie and guitarist Larry Gott jammed to lay the seeds for songs before guitarist-violinist Saul Davies, keyboardist Mark Hunter, drummer Dave Baynton-Power and trumpeter Diagram branched out ideas. It's a process that recalls how 1994's largely improvisational Wah Wah came from Laid outtakes.

"We purposely felt like 'We're coming back after this many years, so the record has to be killer,'" says Booth, 48. "We overdid it to make sure we had enough strong songs."

> "We're coming back after this many years, so the record has to be killer," says Booth.

The title track is liable to spark the strongest reaction in this country, however, and not just because it's catchy. An evocative lyricist, Booth has moved from the personal to the political in past numbers about government corruption and global warming, but that doesn't prepare the listener for "Hey Ma." A post-9/11 protest against the consequences of British-American policies, it sports a jarringly jaunty chorus of "The boys in body bags, coming home in pieces."

"I will probably offend some people and I'll have to take that on the chin," says Booth, suggesting the only parallel might be Country Joe and the Fish's Vietnam-era rag "I Feel Like I'm Fixing to Die" (with its own zinger "Be the first one on your block, to have your boy come home in a box").

Though James relented to the removal of a gun from a baby's reach in the cover art for Hey Ma, the group is known for having a stubborn streak in direct contrast to the often calm, atmospheric momentum of its music. Through its first several years, James shunned the press and record labels.

"We just figured it was all bullshit," Booth says. "We were really bloody-minded. I think we were the only band ever to turn down a [New Musical Express] front cover.... We wanted to play live and have people work out how brilliant we were in that way."

James has long worked its magic onstage, going back to the night the fledging group spotted drama student Booth in the crowd "dancing like a crazy person" and asked him to join the band as a dancer. Soon he also became the singer and lyricist. "I didn't know I could do it until I did it."

These days, Booth—who shaved off his curly hair to play a minor villain in the 2005 movie Batman Begins—is poised on all fronts. And Americans get an extra shot at discovering old gems like the dance-savvy "Come Home" and whooping "Born of Frustration," capped by Diagram's soaring trumpet. "People are looking for great bands live," Booth says. "We're coming back to America very, very hungry." ***

This Ain't Klezmer

Kosher Rock New Jersey–based Silver Jews make a pilgrimage to the Middle East on Sept. 5. Fresh off their new album Lookout Mountain, Lookout Sea, the band performs its inventive country-rock fusion and wise-cracking lyrics, which have entertained concert-goers since 1989. Despite frequent lineup changes, vocalist (and successful poet) David Berman's sardonic sound has produced seven full-length albums and even a documentary film of the group's 2006 Tel Aviv tour. Silver Jews' current incarnation, which includes Berman's wife, Cassie, is folksier but still promises to be more fun than your cousin's bar mitzvah. Yarmulkes are optional.

Man in the Mixed-Media Mirror At the OHT Gallery Sept. 5–27, artist Ben Sloat explores the King of Pop's cultural impact through mixed-media works in his exhibit I'm Not Like Other Guys. Thankfully, Sloat decided to focus on Jackson's Thriller days. We'll gladly take red-and-white varsity jackets and moonwalks over Neverland and cosmetic surgery.

Rockie Horoscope {ROCKIE GARDINER}

GIRL POWER

[AUGUST 23–SEPTEMBER 22]
Although it's been building all year long, the streak of good luck you've been on is liable to reach a peak before your birthday celebration is history. Thanks to growth-oriented Jupiter in your Capricorn house of creative output, true love and other risky endeavors, even reticent Virgins can go hog wild with joy. Well, maybe not when restrictive Saturn in your sign and jolly Jupiter trine, but certainly while the resourceful Virgo sun and the giant planet perfect the most advantageous aspect of them all on Sept. 4, the opening day of the NFL season.

LIBRA [September 23–October 22]
While the blessings bestowed by the beneficial trine between your Venus ruler and enthusiastic Jupiter may be on the wane, more favors could flow to your family from a well-placed associate. Not that you won't be appreciative, but since you've been handling the matter for some time, you could sense that your methods are being tested. Until ballsy Mars in Libra challenges Jupiter shortly after Labor Day, you won't be sure. New attractions and amusements to distract you after Venus enters your sign on the 30th.

SCORPIO [October 23–November 21]
The special connection between the Scorpion and the Virgin is a mystery to many; nonetheless, more often than not, the relationship is strong, honest and mutually beneficial. Scorpios don't mind Virgos' paranoia and constant quibbling since they actually listen, sometimes even follow, your advice. Since both signs are protected by Jupiter this year, don't be surprised if you reap more than you sow in next few weeks. Especially around the Virgo new moon on the 30th.

SAGITTARIUS [November 22–December 21] It can't be repeated enough: Your Jupiter ruler in your Capricorn house of assets is key to the goodies being spread throughout the zodiac. While career concerns may dominate your thoughts during Virgo, favorable aspects from the crown of your solar chart to your bank balance should ease your mind, especially when the sun and Jupiter trine on Sept. 4. Further action follows, so be alert to what seems to be developing right around the new lunar cycle that begins as August ends. Until then, secrets revealed, passions unleashed!

CAPRICORN [December 22–January 20]
The free ride you've been on continues as far-sighted Jupiter in your sign attracts further advantages right after Labor Day. Going to St. Paul for the GOP or Minneapolis for Rage? For cautious earth signs like yours, any day during solar Virgo can be a blessing, especially if the benefits coming your way include lots of other people's money. The increased interest in sex shouldn't hurt, either. But the icing on the cake, the cherry on top, appears when Jupiter and your Saturn ruler perfect their rewarding trine on Sept. 8.

AQUARIUS [January 21–February 18]
For a change, clarity. Perhaps not as much as you'd like or need if you were born in mid-February, but for Aquarians who don't have nebulous Neptune sitting on their natal sun degree, a break in the fog and fantasies clouding your vision. So much for the summer hiatus. Now it's back to school or the drawing board as Mercury and Venus join Mars, another of the personal planets, in your Libra house of higher education and lifelong goals. Wait for the new moon on the 30th to click in before taking the next step.

PISCES [February 19–March 19]
Friends don't let friends champion the wrong cause. The ridiculously easy, super-supportive trine next week between expansive, expensive Jupiter and the "make it perfect" Virgo sun—as rewarding a planetary relationship as there is—can be a major drain, emotionally and financially, on someone close to you. How vocal a protest you should make depends on how vehemently you think your opinion is the correct one. However, if you're still on the fence, then bide your time until more information is revealed as, no doubt, it will be.

ARIES [March 20–April 19]
It might not qualify as pleasure per se, but there's a good chance you'll soon be mixing business with an enjoyable pastime. Working a celebrity charity event? Taking a client to a ball game? Since your heartfelt Mars ruler is in your Libra marriage house for the first time in two years, playing the field might not be as appealing as usual. Despite the Ram's tendency to pursue with passion and possibly scare the object of your affection, this time, try wooing with finesse and the romantic gestures that a Libra would.

TAURUS [April 20–May 20]
Verbal and visually gifted Bulls benefit when Mercury and your artistic Venus ruler meet in your Virgo house of creativity and romance. Teachers and other performers, both gifted or not especially, may be more expressive as well. Be aware that all of you is likely to have a change of heart when least expected. More specifically, at the end of the month when suspicious Pluto raises doubts about someone or something you love dearly. Emotional, and to some extent financial, insecurity could linger through Labor Day.

GEMINI [May 21–June 20]
Talented Twins shouldn't neglect what appears to be an easy opportunity to show their stuff. Don't assume that because this audience isn't your typical employer or fan base that they won't appreciate what you can do for them. Taking chances, betting on long shots works in your favor until Labor Day. That's when your Mercury ruler gets drawn into a complicated dance through your Libra house of creativity, romance and recreation, setting the stage for the hassles that'll arise during the next retrograde period: Sept. 24–Oct. 15.

CANCER [June 21–July 22]
While you may already have a reason to treasure lucky Jupiter's presence in your Capricorn marriage house, it could pale when compared to the benefits you're about to accrue. The rewarding trine relationship this year between Mr. Lucky and constructive Saturn in discerning Virgo is surely a blueprint for success. Add the supportive trine from the Virgo sun just after Labor Day, and your fall season should begin on a resounding high note. Just remember to keep your partners, the source of these favors, content.

LEO [July 23–August 22]
Unlike Crabs, Lions need to keep their coworkers, not their life or business partners, happy. These coworkers, along with service personnel and health professionals, are the people providing the benefits you're about to enjoy. Because the trines from generous Jupiter to Saturn and the sun occur in your Virgo house of money earned, the majority of the rewards should be financial. Perhaps other valuable items will show up, or the values you profess will be reinforced, but basically it's about the bucks. Is there a raise in the works?

NOUVEAU AND RICHE

When It Rains, She Pours...

Besides ogling some staggering trinkets, guests at the VIP Opening of the Museum of Fine Arts' new exhibit Imperishable Beauty: Art Nouveau Jewelry had the added pleasure of entering through the grand marble Fenway entrance, which hasn't been used in a dog's age.

Cocktails and supper were served in the rotunda, and the attendees included mega-benefactress Susan Kaplan and the stunningly poised and lovely Gila Belsky, Unicef factotum Kimberly Treacy, the perfectly lovely Karen Rotenberg (whose own dazzler of a necklace was made by an artist in Paris), Skinner jewelry guru Gloria Lieberman and her other half, Larry, Boston Herald scribe Larry Katz and saucy NEC student Brandon Cordeiro, to name but a few, who "oohed" and "aahed" over the shiny baubles on display.

"I don't have any intaglios or enamel jewelry," one guest said to a friend. "Feel free to mention that to my husband; my birthday's in six weeks."

However, the party's funniest remark came from the woman who shared, "That rainstorm the other night forced me to have three vodka gimlets. I was stuck at a bar without an umbrella."

Drinking Is Fundamental...

It's difficult to imagine a more delightful spot for a party than the architectural oasis at the center of the Boston Public Library, and Cocktails in the Courtyard—a fundraiser for the Young Professionals of the BPL—didn't disappoint.

Among the bright young things on hand: cochair Alec Stern and the lovely Grayson Moore, Indian goddess Renu Babu, development diva Daria McLean, perennial playboy Lance Kussel, patrician party fixture Peter Creighton, the shockingly handsome Sven Meier, gorgeous MD Zinaria Williams and one person who reminisced with some old friends about their misspent youths, prompting another of them to say, "There's still plenty of coke whores in Boston; there's just no civilized place for them to congregate."

The bartenders churned out the cocktails, while a jazz band played behind the fountain, and couples danced beneath the stars. One guest (namely yours truly) even pulled a page from Zelda Fitzgerald's playbook and jumped into the fountain, which surprisingly didn't seem to bother the guards at all.

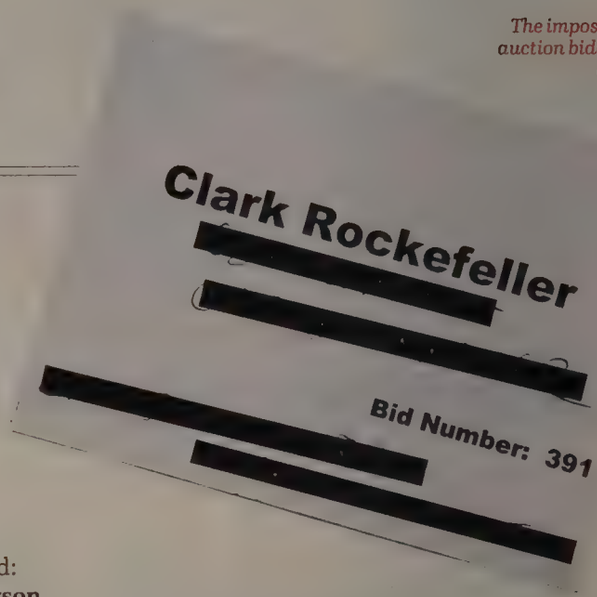
The evening's most amusing comment: In reference to his college roommate, who later turned out to be gay, a guest said, "I don't really know who he was sleeping with back then, but I did hear a lot of non–gender-specific giggling through the walls."

15 Minutes of Shame...

So my S.O. and I are having dinner at the Beehive last winter when a woman I've apparently met but don't really remember comes up to our table and starts going on and on about some damn thing while my other half politely refrains from telling her to beat it.

She eventually disappears but then returns a few minutes later with a dorky-looking guy in tow, saying, "I really want you two to meet. This is Clark Rockefeller."

The impostor's auction bidding card



I shake his hand, we exchange some niceties, and he apologizes for not having a business card but scribbles his personal information on the bid number he was using at a charity auction earlier that evening. Then they finally, thankfully, leave, and I tuck the card away and promptly forget all about him—until a month or so later.

I'm at a cocktail party in Cambridge, and I find myself standing next to David Rockefeller Jr. By way of idle chitchat, I say, "I think I met your son a while back."

He says, "That's strange. I don't have a son."

I shrug, and then promptly forget about Clark Rockefeller a second time—until I see his face wallpapered across every newspaper in America. So now I can add "famous imposter and kidnapping/murder suspect" to my very long list of "Unsavory People With Whom I've Shaken Hands."

Zinaria Williams at the BPL

Ouch!

From someone who was there, we hear the following took place at Barack Obama's $14,000-a-head 47th birthday party at the State Room: Harry Connick Jr. and Obama's daughter sang "Happy Birthday" to the presidential hopeful. Later, Boston Philharmonic conductor Benjamin Zander jumped onstage uninvited, alarming the Secret Service, and said, "We can do better than that!" Then he led the entire room in song, leaving Connick looking visibly steamed. ×××

I had reached a cultural low. For the first time, I called in my vote (twice) for my favorite reality-show contender. This is what happens during summer. I get distracted by dreck, as quality programming runs dry.

Saving me from myself, the fall arts season has finally arrived. I've already finished Ms. Hempel Chronicles by Sarah Shun-Lien Bynum and devoured half of American Wife by Curtis Sittenfeld. From my shelf, Dennis Lehane's The Given Day is prompting me to speed-read the rest.

And that's just books! Countless concerts, exhibits, plays and movies—including Max Payne with our cover guy Chris O'Donnell—are coming to town. We've sifted through the city's offerings to present the top picks in our annual entertainment guide. From hip-hop to jazz, biographies to fiction, chick flicks to thrillers, it's in this issue.

Of course, autumn brings another good distraction: football. Consider "The Art of War," our breakdown of the Patriots' strategy for Super Bowl redemption, your playbook. The march to February begins.

A skilled hatmaker is a rare find. A skilled armorer even more so. Denise Wallace, the costume crafts artisan and dyer at the Huntington Theatre, has to be both. "In this current show [How Shakespeare Won the West], I had to learn millinery from the 1840s," says Wallace, 47. "You have to do a little bit of everything."

She's in charge of creating the hats, shoes, jewelry, leatherwork, Greco-Roman armor and general accessories worn by the Huntington's actors. "The most important thing for a good craftsperson is to have a knack with materials and the physics of materials," explains Wallace, a 20-year company veteran. ("I like to say I started as a toddler.") During that time she's survived rigors like hand-painting 100 yards of fabric in watery colors for a cast of fairies, or reoutfitting ancient Greeks when their clanging armor drowned the actors' voices. "My favorite costume was for To Kill a Mockingbird," she says. "The ham costume that Scout wears in her school play."

Over the decades, Wallace has evolved into such an expert milliner and dyer that she teaches classes on the subject at Boston University. She's also developed her own line of headwear. "Men's shapes in women's colors" is how she describes it. But the key in all her work is detail.

"I try to sand down any edges that get between the audience and the playwright's words," she says. "I try to make it as real as possible, so someone doesn't watch the whole play while thinking about how the shoes look wrong."

ANDREW RIMAS

Drink of the Moment

From Madaket With Love

As carefree, sunshiny summer winds down, we need a soothing bridge into the bitter, brittle days of fall. The season when it's dark after work, when we lose our healthy tans and the decaying leaves remind us that everything once vibrant, including ourselves, will one day die. Thankfully, this bridge will get you drunk.

Toro's Nantucket Mule ($10) is an autumnal twist on the excellent beach cocktail, the Moscow Mule, itself a vodka version of the classic rum and ginger beer combination known as the Dark and Stormy. "This is a spin that uses regional ingredients, like a house-made cranberry compote, which is very New England," explains bar manager Courtney Bissonnette. The Mule also includes Nantucket's own Triple Eight vodka, cranberry and ginger syrups, lime juice and ginger beer.

Fans of the Dark and Stormy genus know that ginger beer is the capstone to the cocktail. Use one that's too light, and the drink won't have the requisite kick. Use one that's too hot, and it's like acid reflux in reverse. Bissonnette prefers Barritts. "It's the traditional ginger beer for Dark and Stormys," she says before cracking open a can. "It's not overly spiced. It's like a ginger soda."

The Nantucket Mule is an attractive, richly colored drink, like a Cape Codder dressed up for some leisurely yachting. Refreshing, and both sweet and spicy, the cranberries heighten the cocktail's Christmas in July feel. "The compote is the backbone of the drink," Bissonnette says. "Then the ginger beer and ginger beer syrup brings everything together."

Raise one to summer's passing. And when the equinox comes, raise a few more. You'll need 'em.

ASK THE EXPERT

Q: WHAT TYPES OF FURNITURE MAKE GOOD INVESTMENTS?

JILL GOLDBERG INTERIOR DESIGNER AND OWNER OF HUDSON IN BOSTON AND WELLESLEY

"Any time you buy a piece of furniture you should stick with traditional lines. Traditional doesn't necessarily mean going for Queen Anne; rather, [choose] simple pieces that are neutral in style and color. In a sofa, don't get the big box or the camelback. Upholstery is easy to renew with pillows or a new carpet, so shy away from patterns and primary colors. In case goods, the best woods to stick with are simple finishes like mahogany. A light pine is very country, and anything high-gloss will only work in a modern room. If the lines of the furniture are clean and basic, they will look new with simple changes. You never know when your style is going to change. I'll set up for fall and by spring be totally sick of the room. Big pieces are what you should spend your money on, and then dress it up with easily changeable accessories."

Killer Kabob

For a new restaurant, food hype based on the coconut shrimp might sound like a not-so-subtle way of saying don't bother. But Tamarind Bay has always exceeded expectations, and owners BS Ajai Kumar and Vikas Kapoor continue to do so with their second location in Washington Square (they've picked up where Indian Cafe left off). A peek through the open windows reveals cool-blue colors and a seafood-heavy menu clearly mimicking a coastal feel. Our favorite appetizer threads four coconut-flavored shrimp along a stiff scallion.

More on Malbec

By now Argentine malbec may be old news, but its consistency, vintage to vintage and brand to brand, still amazes me. In a year with generally declining sales of imported wines in the United States, it's no surprise that Argentina is on a hot streak, up more than 30 percent. My semiannual malbec blind tastings have again turned up virtually all winners. Although this is one of the few wines that's guaranteed to taste good, the following beauties well exceed that threshold. Each is an extraordinary value. In today's market, your buck won't go as far in any other red wine category.

Don Miguel Gascón Malbec, Mendoza, 2007 ($13.99, Charles St. Liquors). Don't let the price scare you, this is the real deal. Produced by a venerable 19th-century Argentine winery, whose malbec was once a rustic-styled bruiser, this iteration is a marvel of polish and elegance. Medium-to-full in body, with a plum-jam aroma and ripe black-raspberry–like flavor, its brilliant coffee-mocha accents linger well into the finish. Very pure, very delicious.

La Posta "Pizzella Family Vineyard" Malbec, La Consulta, 2006 ($17.99, Martignetti's). An unusual vineyard-designated bottling, this is from a high-elevation site in the cooler La Consulta subzone of Mendoza. Made from ungrafted vines, this artisan malbec has a floral fragrance with dark, smoky hints of dried fruits. It's rich and velvety on the palate, with very soft acidity and a round texture reminiscent of a cherry liqueur. Dress it down (a cheeseburger would work) or up (a juicy sirloin), and it'll fit right in.

Luigi Bosca Reserva Malbec, Luján de Cuyo, 2005 ($13, Blanchards). This is one of those wow experiences. Bright in color with wood smoke and blackberry aromas, there's a sweetness in the flavors of this reserve wine that's absolutely delicious. But what makes it memorable is the edginess of bitter chocolate and savory vegetal spice that balances the intense, superripe fruit. Dense and concentrated, it's a wine I'd enjoy with Jamaican jerk pork.

Tilia Malbec, Mendoza, 2007 ($11.99, Brix). Tilia was a great find last year, and the 2007 vintage is even better. If you're a fellow chocoholic, get a bottle. From the black-cherry cocoa aroma to the luscious creamy texture, to the Raisinette finish, this is all about up-front sensual drinking pleasure. There's a minimum of tannins and a cool, spicy note punctuating lush, ripe dark-fruit flavors. Yum!

Doña Paula Estate Malbec, Luján de Cuyo, 2006 ($15, the Wine Emporium). From its estate vineyards in the Andes Mountain foothills, Doña Paula makes a lovely blueberry- and mint-scented wine that shows softness and elegance, with a touch more balancing acidity than most other malbecs. Round in texture, with the signature chocolate, black-cherry spice, it has a bit more tart, herbal essences in the finish. You'll enjoy this with a grilled chicken rubbed in rosemary and thyme.

Going Out

DISCO FEVER

Nick Varano holds court in the back of his new North End restaurant. Even as the sun shines through the open, floor-to-ceiling windows, the place glows with neon and projected light bouncing off disco balls. In between giving orders, Varano sings along to a '70s tune. "Who is this?" he asks. "The Intruders! A Philly group!" shouts a server. Varano's head goes back to nodding along. Only days after opening, it's obvious he's having fun.

For those of us who spend Saturday mornings on the couch watching old Phantom Gourmet shows, Varano is best known for the commercial for his other restaurant, Strega. According to the ad, the flashy and flat-screened venue was born from Varano's idea of an ideal restaurant as a kid. ("I guess I spent a lot of time at home watching TV and listening to music," he explains.) Which would make Nico the place for his less distant, more bell-bottomed former self. "It's disco-themed," Varano says under a bank of TVs playing an old Bee Gees video. "It's the music I like. It's real energetic and real lively. People hear something and say 'Oh, I remember that song,' and just start bopping."

The menu at the sparkling 48-seater is also designed around his favorites. "I made it so I wouldn't have a bad meal," the portly owner acknowledges. "As you can see, I've eaten out a lot in my life." In keeping with the theme, there's the Funky Town fusilli ($21.95) and Danny Terrio's Delmonico ($29.95). There are also more homestyle dishes. "Now that's a meatball!" Varano declares as a giant sphere of veal and wild mushroom ($9.95) slides onto the table. "With a little fresh ricotta on the side? Bye-bye!"

And though many may think that disco is dead, Varano isn't concerned. "People want to be entertained and have fun," he says. "There are 100 other great restaurants in the neighborhood, which I think is the best in the world. Here, people look inside; they hear the music; they know coming in what it's going to be."

Question for Frederick Ilchman
What are your guilty pleasures?

Frederick Ilchman is an assistant curator of paintings at the Museum of Fine Arts. Ilchman will be handling the spring exhibition, Titian, Tintoretto, Veronese: Rivals in Renaissance Venice.

Sports talk radio. "I listen to WEEI's Planet Mikey show late at night. Especially when something big goes down, like the Red Sox winning the World Series or the Manny Ramirez trade. I tune in to figure out if the callers are tipsy or just enacting their childhood sorrows. They just keep talking and can't stop. And Mike Adams, the host, can be ruthless with those people."

Italian Bruce Springsteen message boards. "I have a strong admiration for Bruce Springsteen, even for his sentimental songs like 'Bobby Jean.' Besides going to a lot of his concerts, I've followed him on Italian message boards both to practice my Italian and to see how his lyrics, which reference very American things, are received by someone in another country."

Hip-hop. "For a while I tried to follow hip-hop. In 1996, I was teaching at Columbia University, and Lauryn Hill was one of my students. Around that time she was working on an album with the Fugees. She was really smart but rarely showed up for class. She was killing me softly with her poor attendance. Her next album in 1998 was called The Miseducation of Lauryn Hill. I like to think that my class helped inspire that." LINH TRAN BRINCAT

BOXED IN

How merlot can you go?

A FRIEND WAS HAVING A WINE party on her roof deck. An excellent hostess, she waded through the crowd to greet me and offer a drink, perhaps not seeing that I came bearing gifts. Well-mannered, I had a 2006 California cabernet in hand, four bottles worth to be exact, in a box. It's not the proverbial turd in the punchbowl, but showing up with box wine is like taking your cousin to the prom. In a Firebird.

Trying everything but rubbing my belly and saying, "Mmm, yummy," I did my best to sell it, but there were few takers. (Although I did get an "It's fing fabulous!" from the drunkest person at the party, shortly before she left.) As one woman explained, the prevailing feeling is, "I just wouldn't trust it." Even late into the night, the two best responses were, "It's not bad," and a charitable, "Totally decent."

Around for decades, box wine suffers a reputation for being low market, mostly because, for years, it sucked. Hooch sullying swill's good name. But now, new, better brands are adopting the packaging. One reason: Boxes are lighter than glass, leading to buzzwords like "carbon footprint." One bottle of wine shipped from Napa to New York generates twice the emissions of a three-liter box. Then for non-hippies, there are important drinking benefits. Box wine stays fresh for weeks, eliminating the "problem" of having to immediately finish every bottle you open. Plus, boxes don't break when dropped, which is key after quaffing a few liters of shiraz.

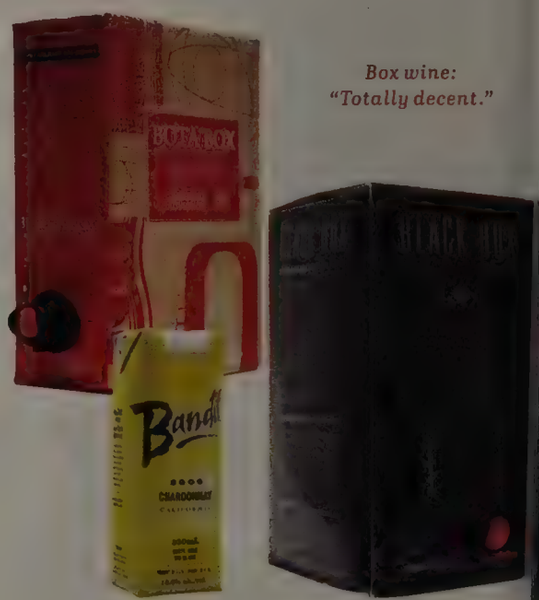
At the moment, the problem really isn't what's in the box, but the box itself. Oenophiles are traditionalists, and if you're going to make changes, you have to hide them. Like sneaking your dog's medicine in a treat, you've got to wrap a plastic cork under the foil. With that in mind, I spread out some cheese and crackers and held a wine tasting, keeping the packaging safely out of view.

The guests were my buddy Adam, an aspiring connoisseur fresh off a trip through southern Italy, and my friend John, who will drink anything. First up was the leftover cabernet from Bota Box ($18.99). When asked for a grade, Adam hemmed and hawed about tannins, while John stepped it up and asked, "With A being Opus One and F being Boone's Farm?" After the cab was given a chance to breathe, it moved into the low B range, although Adam didn't try to hide his grimace when saying, "I guess I could order this with dinner."

Next was a merlot from Black Box ($26.99). "It has a cleaner finish, much smoother," Adam said, before declaring, "B+, but I'm biased because I don't like merlot." (Easy there, Giamatti.) Both Adam and John gave the merlot a restaurant price point of $30-$35, an amount more than triple the three-liter box's value. As a qualifier, John added, "I've paid a lot more for worse wine."

Buzzing now, the tasting became more of a slugging, which worked out as the last wine was the loser of the night. A chardonnay from Bandit ($12) came in tetra packs—basically adult juice boxes. With our professionalism eroded, I labeled the flat and fruity juice "chick wine," a term quickly met with concurring nods. Somehow finding a less classy way to summarize, John concluded, "If I was trying to get someone drunk, and I was drinking beer, I'd give them this."

After the reveal, John took one look at the tetra packs and shouted, "That shit is raunchy"—a heady thought to consider when choosing a wine for your next picnic. Adam defined the spectrum with a bit more grace, saying, "I'm not surprised by the chard and very impressed with the merlot." Highlighting the Black Box victory, John added, "I just poured two more," and handed Adam a glass. ✖✖✖



Box wine: "Totally decent."

SECRET AGENT

When Maggie Gyllenhaal became the new face for sexy lingerie label Agent Provocateur, I was slightly thrown off. "Maggie is not an obvious sex symbol," Agent Provocateur cofounder Serena Rees recently told reporters. "She is interesting looking, confident and beautiful in a way that is non-threatening, which makes her appealing to men and women alike." This got me wondering—do men and women really find the same things hot? Obviously confidence is key, but I'm strictly talking undergarments here. To find out, my coworker Nick Altschuller picked his top two outfits and we compared thought processes. In the end, I learned a slight amount about the male psyche and a little TMI about Nick's personal tastes. See for yourself in October when the shop opens its Newbury Street location.

AMANDA KNORR

Nick: Despite all the frills, this one doesn't look too complicated, which is good, because ideally I'd be turned on, not anxious about how to get it off and still look cool.
Amanda: I really like the skirt and colors, but something about it's a little French maidy.

Nick: Ever since my first stolen Playboy, I've liked corsets. But those panties seem awful familiar. Wait, I'm not supposed to say that word, am I?
Amanda: It looks too painful to be sexy—unless you're into that sort of thing.

A LIVING HELL

DEAR ANTICHRIST:
I truly believe that you, my soon-to-be ex-roommate, are the spawn of Satan. This past year, you put me and our third roommate through hell. We are no angels ourselves, but unlike you we: Take out trash, wash and put away dishes, keep the noise at a comfortable minimum, resist parading around in our underwear, abstain from slamming doors, flush and, most importantly, we treat others with respect and kindness. We also do not appreciate you stealing all the kitchenware and toilet paper, leaving us hungry and wet. Not to mention the foul stench that emanated from your room because, instead of washing your underwear, you just bought more. When we tried to confront you about these little treacheries, you flat-out ignored us and stomped off into your smelly bedroom. So farewell, you she-devil. This will be the last time I lug your empty wine bottles down to the dump, or scrub off the pasta sauce you left to dry and stain the countertop. I am not a religious woman, but may the Lord be with you, for you are the Antichrist.

Sincerely, your roommate,
The Revelationist

PS: We saw you take those nudie pictures of yourself.

To an old acquaintance:

We met at a Cambridge start-up a decade ago and struck up a friendly flirtation that included lunches, laughs, and a mutual love of music and good books. I was an intern with long brown hair, and you were a bespectacled superior who was a decade older than I was. We both hailed originally from a non-exotic island and were both in committed relationships at the time. Although I'm sure we would've never made a solid, long-term match, there was certainly a palpable physical attraction between the two of us—and you still creep into my thoughts at least once a year. Because life for me is destined for monogamy in the suburbs, I enjoy the occasional thought of how incredible it was to kiss you after our single after-work meeting at an unromantic pub off the Red Line. Over the last 10 years, we have run into each other a few times and exchanged a few e-mails, never salacious, just friendly. I am married now and plan on staying that way, but wonder why you spring to mind every so often. Is there something unresolved about our fleeting flirtation 10 years ago? If you figure me out and want to say hello, e-mail me. I have the same e-mail address I had a decade ago, the name of which always made you laugh. As we're both writers in some form, a brief meeting could provide the kind of material that propels both of our creative tendencies. Think about it...

Dear Ms. What Not to Wear Boston:

You don't have a supermodel's physique (who does?!), so why do you shove yourself into size-zero apparel!? You're doing yourself an injustice as you force your curvy hips into skinny jeans that, let's face it, are not creating a skinny style. You have a lot going for you—pretty face, gorgeous hair, sultry, womanly shape—so dress it up! Trade the tube top for a flowing top (correctly sized, please) and some well-cut denim. Leave those platform sandals at home and parade around Park Street in some adorable ballet flats, or even better yet, some cute heels to lengthen those attractive legs of yours. If you stop trying to be the next Kate Moss, you might actually realize that you are a dead ringer for Kate Winslet.

Sincerely,
Frustrated Fashionista

STELLA ARTOIS

Perfection HAS ITS PLACE

A perfectly poured Stella Artois is the Gold Standard of Belgian beer.

Step One THE PURIFICATION

The bartender selects the signature glass for the beer being poured. The glass is scrubbed in a cool-water bath, preferably with a mild detergent. It's then rinsed with cold water to chill the glass.

Step Two THE SACRIFICE

The tap is opened in one swift motion to let the first burst of foam flow away. It must never enter the glass, thus ensuring every drop of beer is fresh.

Step Three THE LIQUID ALCHEMY

The glass is held at a 45-degree angle to create the perfect balance of liquid to foam.

Step Four THE HEAD

The head is created by straightening and lowering the glass. The foam is visually appealing and releases the beer's aroma.

Step Five THE REMOVAL

The bartender closes the tap in one quick action and moves the glass away from the faucet to ensure no drops spoil the perfect head.

Step Six THE BEHEADING

While the beer is flowing over the edge of the glass, the bartender cuts the head gently with a head cutter at a 45-degree angle. This eliminates the larger bubbles that burst easily and accelerate the dissipation of the head.

Step Seven THE JUDGMENT

The bartender now stands in judgment. The beer's head should be two fingers thick.

Step Eight THE CLEANSING

The bartender then rinses the bottom and sides of the glass. This keeps the glass clean and cool and makes it comfortable to hold.

Step Nine THE BESTOWAL

A perfectly poured pint of Belgian beer is presented with the logos of the coaster and glass facing the customer.

Revenge of the Nerds

WITH ITS ENDEARINGLY hilarious subtitle, American Nerd: The Story of My People explores this demographic/diagnosis. Author Benjamin Nugent observes Nerdland both from an intellectual distance and from within the cozy cave of its ethos. His people go way back: In Pride and Prejudice, Jane Austen mocked Mary Bennet, having her speak in a factual, pedantic way that has a sort of proto-MIT-robotic tone. In the '70s, SNL's snuffly, glasses-pushing Lisa Loopner and Todd DiLamuca of the ridiculous pants became modern, lovable nerdetypes. Though famously operating from the neck up, their ilk's social ineptness, Nugent alleges, is in part a misunderstanding by cool kids. Albeit often through the machines and screens of video games, underage nerds bond heavily, affectionately, through Dungeons and Dragons and later in medieval enactments, which provide roles, hierarchies and a ready-made formalized language. Nugent's heartbreaking chapter on a childhood friend, Kenneth, whose chaotic, violent mother married six times, illustrates how nerdy war games helped him compensate for powerlessness and loneliness. Also endearing is the author's own off-kilter, unathletic, wizard-seeking kid.

American Nerd: The Story of My People is by Benjamin Nugent, who grew up in Cambridge and Amherst.

SOOTHING SPIRIT OWNER TSERING NGODUP LAMA

The Giving Tree

THE BREEZES of spiritual attitudes and teachings blow through the beautifully exotic, mostly Tibetan items at Bodhi Tree in Cambridge. Owner Tsering Ngodup Lama offers Buddhist-tradition meditation classes that focus on "transforming thought into positive love and compassion, to improve oneself, be kinder to oneself and tolerant of others." In that same pleasing vein, sterling-silver jewelry and semiprecious stones symbolically send forth various soothing spirits. Carnelian "speaks" a mantra of compassion; turquoise offers a healing effect; a vividly elaborate silver pin represents the Om symbol. As if inspiring and protecting, Buddha heads—copper, bronze, wood and stone—overlook the shop from a high shelf. As you pass a stick around Bodhi Tree's golden-colored singing bowls, take time—two minutes feels like a beautiful eternity—to appreciate the ringggggg! Each bowl sings its own note, sending you, incidentally, into a dreamy trancelike state or into actual meditation. Nepalese fabrics of the highest quality include pashminas and silk scarves in purple, pink and green shades. And some wild rugs with colorful tigerish designs could cheer up a solemn floor.

Bodhi Tree: The Art of Gentle Living (1684 Mass. Ave., Cambridge, 617-441-3330, bodhitree-cambridge.com) features Tibetan gifts and offers meditation classes on Sundays from 10-11:30 am.

Pietaster Deep ocher sweet potatoes and crunchy pecans signal the onset of fall, and we can't think of a better way to savor them than with a slice of pie. At her color-splashed Somerville bakery, owner Renee McLeod shows off the fruits of her labor—and her grandmother's cherished pastry recipe—with two seasonal stunners. Creamy roasted spuds and warm spices fill her signature sweet potato pie, while toasted nuts meet boozy vanilla in her Southern pecan. They're both proper pieces of home-cooked hospitality.

TRIUMPH OF THE TOMATO

From Amana Orange to Green Zebra

So far, it hasn't been a banner season for tomatoes, at least when it comes to the "Big Boys" planted by Doug Petersen, our state department of agricultural resources commissioner.

"Ah, they're still green," Petersen sighs, then brightens when he surveys long tables laid out with locally grown tomatoes in hues of red, yellow and green, in shapes ranging from perfectly round cherries to hefty, gnarly heirlooms. It's the 24th annual Massachusetts Tomato Festival, and dozens of farmers have brought their ripest, brightest, juiciest specimens to City Hall Plaza to be judged by a panel including yours truly and Rialto chef/owner Jody Adams.

Prizes—tomato-topped trophies—are awarded to the best cherry, slicing and heirloom entrants, as well as the heaviest. As we judge between sips of water and nibbles of saltines, Adams muses that the definitive question remains unanswered: "How is it on bread with Hellman's?" she wonders.

After five years, chef/owner Doug Organ has closed Cafe D in Jamaica Plain. That's not the end of the story, however: Organ has another culinary project in mind, although it may not come to fruition in the same spot that housed both Cafe D and its fine-dining predecessor, the Arbor. In true neighborhood spirit, a note on Cafe D's Web site assures all holders of gift certificates that they'll be honored by the restaurant that opens there.

Speaking of alphabet-names, Cambridge's B-Side Lounge is apparently set to close in the near future and be replaced by a beer bar.

Remember Patrick Connolly, the former Radius chef de cuisine who slipped off to Manhattan after winning a James Beard Award a few months ago? He's landed at Bobo in New York's West Village, the kitchen's third executive chef in a year. And it comes as no surprise that he's advertising for "professional line cooks" on Craigslist.

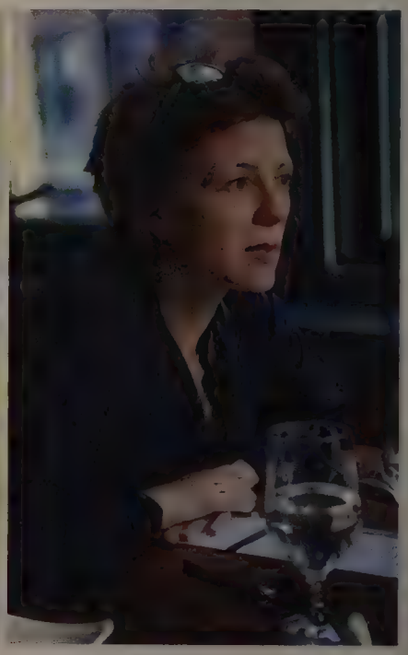
Dining { ERIN BYERS MURRAY WITH JODY ADAMS }

GREEN GODDESS

Persephone's local, sustainable outlook enlivens Fort Point.



FRESH CATCH Jody Adams enjoys her surroundings and dishes like the crabcakes.

"I WISH YOU COULD SEE this view," Rialto's Jody Adams said while looking over my shoulder. From our table at Persephone, I turned to see what Jody meant. The setting sun had painted the Fort Point warehouse buildings the palette of a desert sky—a view framed by huge picture windows. Clearly, she had the best seat in the house.

Turning back, I realized I didn't have much to complain about either. From my spot, the industrialized space spread out before me, filling up with groups of young office workers, couples and local artists. The scene seemed primed for what we hoped would be an unforgettable meal.

Persephone, run by chef Michael Leviton, represents the first of a handful of new restaurants to open and perk up the revived Fort Point area. Judging by the crowd on a Tuesday night, local diners had been clamoring for it. Jody and I bypassed the low-lit bar and lounge, where a group of happy-hour revelers played a game of Guitar Hero, and went straight for the laid-back dining room.

We ordered some wine from our smiling, blonde server; Jody picked a glass of gruner veltliner ($8), while I took a lesson on how to pronounce "assyrtiko" ($12). Our goal was to try as many things on the menu as our eyes allowed, so we started reeling off dishes. The doughy stack of corn fritters ($8) arrived first, followed by lightly grilled squid ($14) layered over a mixture of parsley, olives, lemon juice and chickpeas. "That's funny," Jody said of the seafood. "Just this morning I was working on a dish pairing squid, chickpeas and parsley. It's a smart combo."

There was also a plate of delicate, silver-dollar-sized crabcakes ($15) made with Maine Peekytoe crab, perfectly balanced with a watermelon, cucumber and mint salad. We tasted just a few bites of each to pace ourselves, in anticipation of the bone marrow ($12). Leviton's commitment to using local ingredients meant that the roasted marrow came from Northeast Family Farms, the fleur de sel came from Maine and the bread was baked and grilled in house. Jody fixed a slice with a slather of Dijon mustard, a scoop of marrow and a sprinkle of salt; I did the same but in much bigger doses, and she laughed as I tried to bite into it. "That's a picture right there," she said as I scarfed down the rest. Marrow is apparently a major weakness for both of us.

I continued to devour my portion, while Jody told me about her recent travels. As she talked, her hands moved around the table, adjusting silverware, straightening plates and occasionally reaching up to pull the glasses from her tuft of short red hair. She'd led a cycling trip through Sicily in the spring, inspiring her to bike to work on a regular basis. She'd also taken some time over the winter to visit Rwanda with her son. The experience was life-altering, she explained. They'd gone over to help Partners in Health, an organization she's been closely associated with for several years.

Our server was back a few minutes later with our Flintstonian-sized shoulder-end pork loin ($28 per person), roasted to a nice, mildly pink medium-rare. The pork, along with a few other dishes, was listed under the "extra-large" menu items and could have easily fed a table of four, especially with its sides of grilled radicchio from Siena Farms and creamy, cheese-flecked polenta. The presentation was stunning, of course, but the meat itself was even better—juicy and packed with porcine flavor. We took our first few bites and stopped talking for a full minute. "That," Jody smiled, "is a nice piece of pork."

For reasons we couldn't explain, we had also ordered the line-caught Chatham bluefish ($24) served atop a vegetable mix, but only managed a couple bites before scooping up more pork and polenta. Although none of that stopped us from ordering a ginger ice-cream float ($8) for dessert. I think our eyes had glazed over by the time we were presented with the check and a dish of tiny chocolate truffles. "I'm stuffed," Jody groaned sheepishly before picking up a truffle and taking one last bite. ***

RAISE MY RENT

I'm the super. Thanks for asking.

I'M NOT SURE if you've heard anything about this in the media, so I'm going to let you in on a little secret: The real estate market is in sort of tough shape. I know, I know—I was surprised, too, when I found out. But it's true. Once you've steadied yourself, I'll tell you about gas prices.

I got some firsthand experience with the real estate crash over the past month or so, when Heather and I tried to sell our condo. The first thing I learned about selling property is that when people's parents get involved, you're screwed. Because parents generally haven't lived in a one-bedroom edifice in quite some time, they're not impressed with anything that's smaller and less nice than their house in Wellesley. Moreover, they'll notice and obsess over weird details, such as the brand of your furnace. Seriously. One prospective buyer came for a second visit with parents in tow, and frowns abounded when I didn't know offhand the particular specifications of the furnace. So we all gathered around to look at it, their faces portraits of skepticism as I regaled them with tales of the furnace's glorious ability to turn on and blow hot air and do other noble things—such as not give us carbon monoxide poisoning.

> As a landlord, I plan to chew a cigar and wear Hawaiian shirts.

That guy didn't make an offer.

Another guy did, but his offer was somewhat less than expected. To paraphrase, he offered to kick me in the nuts with a steel-toed boot. I counteroffered that perhaps he could kick me in the nuts with an Acorn slipper, and he counter-counteroffered to kick me in the face with an Air Jordan, at which point negotiations ceased. This fellow also brought a parent in tow, and evidently the whole fam was from New Hampshire. So I can imagine the familial negotiating advice was informed by real estate in the Shire, and went something like, "We bought a whole damn house in

Think that's funny? Send unbiased e-mails to ezra@improper.com.

Eaglebottom for $56,000 in 1987, so no way you should pay more than $200,000 for a condo-minium!"

(As an aside, the realtor made a big deal of the fact that this guy was going to put down $85,000. I still don't understand why I should give a crap. I don't care if you've got $300 and a spare kidney as long as you get a loan. And if anything, a high down payment makes a lowball offer that much more insulting.)

So, onto Plan B: renting our place. Within two hours of posting an ad, I got a phone call from a guy named Mike. "Is the apartment still available?!" he asked. I replied that I only posted it two hours ago, so yes, it was. Mike told me he missed out on one apartment because it rented sight unseen; evidently, the morose real estate market is making for a lot of renters. By noon of that day, Mike was standing in the apartment asking how to get things moving on a lease. He conceded that he needed to check with his girlfriend, but he seemed 90 percent sure he wanted to pull the trigger. Then he left, and I never heard from him again. (He seemed so confident that I didn't bother to get his phone number, e-mail or last name.)

I gave Mike about a day before I concluded that he'd run off with the circus. But the phone kept ringing and the e-mails kept coming, and a little while later a lease was signed. My relief at having the apartment rented was tempered a bit by the realization that I am now a landlord. This means that when the toilet clogs, or the garbage disposal jams, or the velociraptor eggs hatch in the basement, you know who's getting the phone call: a fake number I set up. Because I don't want to deal with any of that stuff. I mean, come on, I don't even live there anymore.

As a landlord, I plan to chew a cigar, wear Hawaiian shirts and master phrases such as, "Have you tried fixing that yourself?" and "Hey, it's the second of the month. Where's my check, huh?" I'll show up at random times carrying a pipe wrench and claim that the sink flange needs adjusting, but really that will just be a pretense to snoop.

I'll also try to forget all the bad things I've done to the places I've rented. A toilet knocked off its mounts during a party. Walls painted in vomit after discovering that Busta Rhymes' "Pass the Courvoisier" is not to be taken literally. Neighbors annoyed. Roofs scaled. Let's just say that, based on prior experience, I'm glad my condo doesn't have a fireplace.

Renting is still a gamble, but my tenants seem like good people, and they got the apartment because they brought their enthusiasm and checkbook. And got there first. Actually, they got there second. I guess it's none of my business what they did to Mike. ✖✖✖

RELIABLE SOX

Three reasons Boston's baseball team will have a repeat

IT'S THAT TIME of year again... a time, that until pretty recently, had been reserved for Red Sox heartbreak. Heading out of August and into September was hellish. Something always went wrong.

Our children don't understand this history. They expect to see Champagne flowing down the Red Sox' heads. They are spoiled beyond belief.

For us seasoned folk, there are reasons to doubt the 2008 Boston Red Sox: Josh Beckett's a mess, the middle relief is worse, and we still haven't figured out how to hit the ball without Manny. But you know what? I'm feeling like a kid today. I believe the Red Sox will win it all again, and here are three reasons why.

I believe the Red Sox will win it all again.

1. JON LESTER

Champions are made on the mound, and for the last year and a half, Beckett was that champ. But with JB's recent struggles, Jon Lester's emergence has been paramount. In fact, his story—from prospect to patient to survivor to World Series champ—is powerful enough to retire on now.

Even if Beckett isn't Beckett for the rest of the season, I still believe the Sox are OK. I'd go to war with Lester as my No. 1 any day.

Chris Collins is a sportscaster for New England Cable News. Contact him at chris@improper.com.

2. DUSTIN PEDROIA

I still remember it vividly. I'm sitting with Dustin Pedroia last winter in Fort Myers, discussing his rookie year. We get to his impressive .317 average, and I ask: "Hey Dustin, think you can you get to .320 this year?" Without hesitation he snaps back, "How about .330?!" Call it what you want—cockiness or confidence—but with only one year under his belt, nobody works it like Pedroia.

Anyone could have had him in the 2004 draft. Despite his gaudy collegiate career, scouts felt he was too small and slow for the majors. Luckily, the Sox eventually got it right. On the day Pedroia was drafted, Theo Epstein said he was the type of gritty, tough-nosed kid that Sox fans would love. Now we all know what he meant.

If the game's on the line, my money's on Pedroia to pull through. He might try and swing for the moon, but, thankfully, he often hits it.

3. NO MANNY

Trading Manny Ramirez was one move I would've never made myself, but I certainly understand why it happened. After withstanding seven-and-a-half years of the guy, why not suck it up for a few more months? But, in the end, we found out it was simply a matter of his teammates not wanting him around anymore.

When Manny Being Manny meant not showing up when he was needed, the camel's back finally broke. It's taken some time to figure out where this team goes without Manny at the No. 4 spot—especially with Mike Lowell's nagging injuries—but hitting won't be the problem.

Let's remember that there's a guy named Kevin Youkilis who's putting up almost the exact same power numbers as Manny (.319, 24 HRs, 90 RBI vs. .314, 26 and 89), and while Jason Bay might not carry Ramirez's clout, Bay's a better teammate, runs the bases better, fields better and has a better arm. And you know what? His power numbers (.293, 26 and 84) aren't too shabby either.

I don't know if I'm in the minority, but I like this Red Sox team—warts and all.

When October rolls around, are you really going to worry about Beckett? I think not.

Do you really believe—even without Manny in the lineup—that David Ortiz won't transform once again into Señor October? I think not.

Sure, the Red Sox got their butts walloped by the Los Angeles Angels this season, but once the weather cools and the pressure increases, should you be concerned the Sox won't heat up? I think not.

Until somebody knocks them off, they're the team to beat. Man, it's great to be a kid again. ×××

TAKE 5

The School of Sports { RICH LEVINE }

ON PEDROIA, PENNANT RACES, JACOBY AND JAMES ANDREWS

THE RED SOX FINAL 5 SERIES

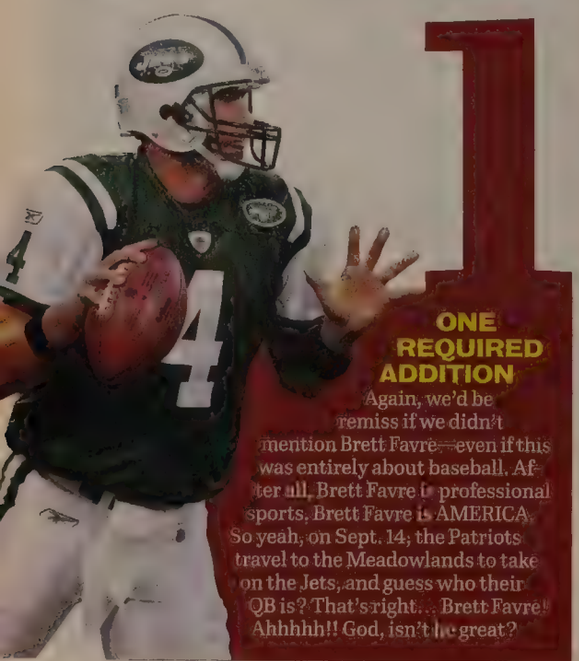
Sept. 12–14 vs. Toronto
We want to finally write off the Jays, but regardless of how mediocre they play against the rest of the league, Toronto has a perpetually tight grip on the groin of Red Sox Nation. With four games in three days, the Sox are almost sure to face Roy Halladay—which means they'd better win the other three.

Sept. 15–17 @ Tampa
If there was ever a time for the Sox national fan base to take control of a series, it's right now. In fact, there'll be so many available seats, we should converge on Tropicana Field like it's the invasion of Troy. Hell to ships, hell to men and hell to Tampa!

Sept. 19–21 @ Toronto
Oh… it's YOU again. Hey, so listen, we've been meaning to mention this for a while now, but can you seriously just back. The eff. Off! Trying to win a pennant here…

Sept. 22–25 vs. Cleveland
If the Sox still need these four games, they'll get at least three, now that Cleveland has nothing left to play for. Potential storylines include: Dustin Pedroia wraps up a batting title; Cliff Lee seals the Cy Young; and Grady Sizemore murders the competition at the Liberty Hotel.

Sept. 26–28 vs. New York
Regardless of the Yankees' standing, here are three things you can count on this weekend: New York will do everything it can to spoil the Sox season; multiple entertaining brawls will develop in the bleachers; and every shade of blue or purple lip gloss on Newbury Street will be bought.



1 ONE REQUIRED ADDITION

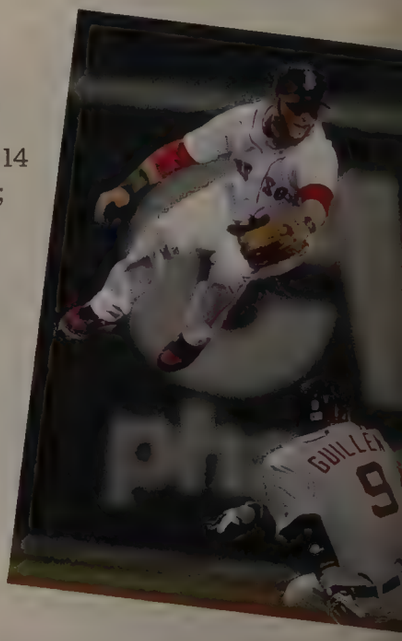
Again, we'd be remiss if we didn't mention Brett Favre—even if this was entirely about baseball. After all, Brett Favre is professional sports. Brett Favre is AMERICA. So yeah, on Sept. 14, the Patriots travel to the Meadowlands to take on the Jets, and guess who their QB is? That's right… Brett Favre! Ahhhhh!! God, isn't he great?

2 AL EAST WILD CARDS

Men at arms… At press time, Tampa's Matt Garza has thrown more than double the innings he did last year, Jamie Shields is quickly approaching his 2007 total and Kazmir, as always, is about as sturdy as wet cardboard. Will they hold up down the stretch, or will their arms go the way of Dr. James Andrews—the three scariest words in sports after "Big Baby's jockstrap"?

Forks on the left, knives on the right… Behind every great winning streak there's a leadoff man who's taking care of business. So far this season, Ellsbury's production has fluctuated like Clemens' polygraph needle, but if he can pull it together and keep the table set, Papi, Bay, Youk and MVPedroia become all the more lethal. Jason Varitek? Still brutal.

4 Ways to Catch the Rays



Super schedule… The Rays play 14 of their last 21 games on the road; the Sox play 14 of their last 20 at home. What more could you ask for? What!? We should kidnap Scott Kazmir's mom? Dude, that's pretty weird.

Get 'em under pressure… Back when the Yankees were good, Sox fans always knew that—no matter how late in the year we controlled the division—it was only a matter of time before the Yanks took it back. Nowadays, the Sox are the Yankees, and Tampa will always know that Boston's there.

Superman lives… It's not easy for a position player to dominate a game, but that's exactly what Dustin Pedroia is doing (and on a nightly basis). He's singlehandedly winning games like Gagne used to lose them, and who amongst you wouldn't give him your vote for MVP? Show yourself!

Close it down… The eighth inning's still an adventure for the Sox—more Poseidon than Bill and Ted's—but once they get to the ninth, the deal's sealed. Tampa? Not so much. Troy Percival's back, but there's a reason that before this year, he hadn't been a full-time closer since Boston hosted the DNC. When a game is on the line, it's always advantage Sox.

3 REASONS THEY WON'T (IF THEY DON'T)

Red Cross Sox… Maintaining a lead despite injuries is one thing. Overcoming a deficit is something entirely different. The Sox can play solid ball without getting 100 percent from Josh Beckett, Mike Lowell and JD Drew, but will they have enough firepower to make up the ground?

Destiny's children… Every once in a while a team will have a season that just defies all odds—not saying Tampa isn't talented but did anyone really believe they'd still be here? If the Rays were going to blow this, it should have happened five times already.

The Curse of the Manbino* by Dan Shaughnessy… Chapter 1: It's a feeling the Fenway Faithful know all too well—torture. It's a throwback to the days of Buckner, Bucky and some guy named Ruth. I'm embarrassed to say it, folks, but it's time to face the facts: Your Red Sox haven't won a World Series since trading Manny Ramirez.

"I love some of these Will Ferrell comedies. I can watch those for days."

Soroff On CHRIS O'DONNELL

The Hollywood hunk discusses on-set drama, "celebrity hall passes" and George Clooney's codpiece.

RETURNING TO THE BIG SCREEN NEXT MONTH in the action flick Max Payne, Chris O'Donnell was born and raised in Winnetka, Ill., and graduated from Boston College. O'Donnell made his film debut opposite Jessica Lange in Men Don't Leave, which was followed by a memorable part in Fried Green Tomatoes. In 1993, he was nominated for a Golden Globe for his starring role opposite Al Pacino in Scent of a Woman. Other credits include Kinsey, The Chamber, In Love and War, The Three Musketeers and Circle of Friends, but he's perhaps best known for playing Robin in Batman Forever and Batman and Robin. In 2002, he made his Broadway debut in Arthur Miller's The Man Who Had All the Luck. He had a recurring role on the hit TV series Grey's Anatomy, and he starred in The Company, a miniseries produced by Ridley Scott. He lives in Los Angeles with his wife, Caroline, and their five children.

Jonathan Soroff: So what was it like having Rosie as a big sister growing up?
Chris O'Donnell: [Laughs.] Y'know, we weren't real close, and it wasn't until I was in my mid-30s that I realized she actually was my sister.

Did you always know she was a lesbian?
I did. I had an inkling.

Speaking of which, do you think Batman and Robin are a gay couple in real life?
I don't, but I can understand the speculation.

How much grief did you take for that role?
A lot. [Laughs.] But I knew what I was getting into before I did it. I think the pluses outweighed the minuses.

Whose codpiece was bigger—yours or George Clooney's?
Clearly mine. I have the tape to prove it.

We know you laid an egg, but did the Batmobile lose a wheel?
[Laughs.] I actually crashed the Batmobile the first time they let me drive the thing. I put it into a curb. They weren't too happy about it.

So is the Grey's Anatomy set a pit of vipers steaming in petty jealousies?
There was definitely some drama. No question. I think that part of it is that you have actors from a range of different backgrounds as far as careers. Some have been in the business a while and had their ups and downs, some are brand-new, and all of a sudden when you get all this power and fame, everyone deals with it differently, which is kind of interesting to watch.

PHOTOGRAPH BY Tony Duran/Creative24

Don't you bet the set of Friends was like that, too, despite all the lovey-dovey crap they spouted to the press?
I don't know. I never did Friends. I had my name mentioned on it once. Jennifer Aniston named me as her "celebrity hall pass." I'm still waiting for the call from her, but the wife and five kids might hold me back.

In one sentence, what is the scent of a woman?
Oh, boy. Hopefully a good one, because a bad one will make you keep your distance.

Favorite movie you've made?
Men Don't Leave. My first one. It's probably the best one I've been in. It was a hugely overlooked film.

What was your worst performance?
It's hard not to say Batman and Robin, though I've given it a good try on several other films.

Your kids' favorite movie of yours?
Surprisingly, I think they even like Batman and Robin better than Batman Forever.

One role you didn't get that you really wanted?
Recently? Half Nelson, the Ryan Gosling movie. When I read it, I thought that was something really out there that no one would have expected from me.

Most ridiculous thing you ever read about yourself in the tabloids?
I guess during the Batman movies, they said I rescued people out of a bat cave in Indonesia or something ridiculous. The only true part was that I actually was in Indonesia.

Any actor or director you'd never work with again?
I didn't exactly enjoy working with Val Kilmer. He gave nothing to anyone else. Not a friendly guy. Just really unpleasant. But I'd probably work with him again, because he's a really great actor.

Actor or director that you'd kill to work with?
Guys like Philip Seymour Hoffman and Daniel Day-Lewis are about as good as it gets, but that list is probably 30 people long.

If you were Jennifer Aniston's "hall pass," who would yours be now?
Again, I think this would probably fall into the there's probably 30 people category.

How many of the sex acts in the movie Kinsey have you actually performed in real life?
I think I got to 118. But who's counting?

Worst job you ever had, acting or otherwise?
Acting's been a pretty steady thing since I was about 14 years old. Before that, it was cutting lawns and a little bit of caddying. As for acting, filming in Cleveland, Miss., at a prison for three or four months is pretty grim. But at the end of the day, I'm still making a movie and I'm still working with Gene Hackman.

If you weren't an actor, what do you think you'd be doing?
Probably living in Chicago and doing something in sales. My major at B.C. was in finance.

Interview question you're most sick of answering?
For a while, it was "Did you really buy a bed from the Four Seasons Hotel?" because I'd mentioned that in an interview.

Dream role?
I love some of these Will Ferrell comedies. I can watch those for days, and I've never done anything like that.

Last question: Would you rather be remembered as a great actor or as a scratch golfer?
I enjoy the competition with my friends when I play golf. Acting is what I do, and I take pride in it, and you'd like to be remembered as having done a good job. ✖✖✖

Fall

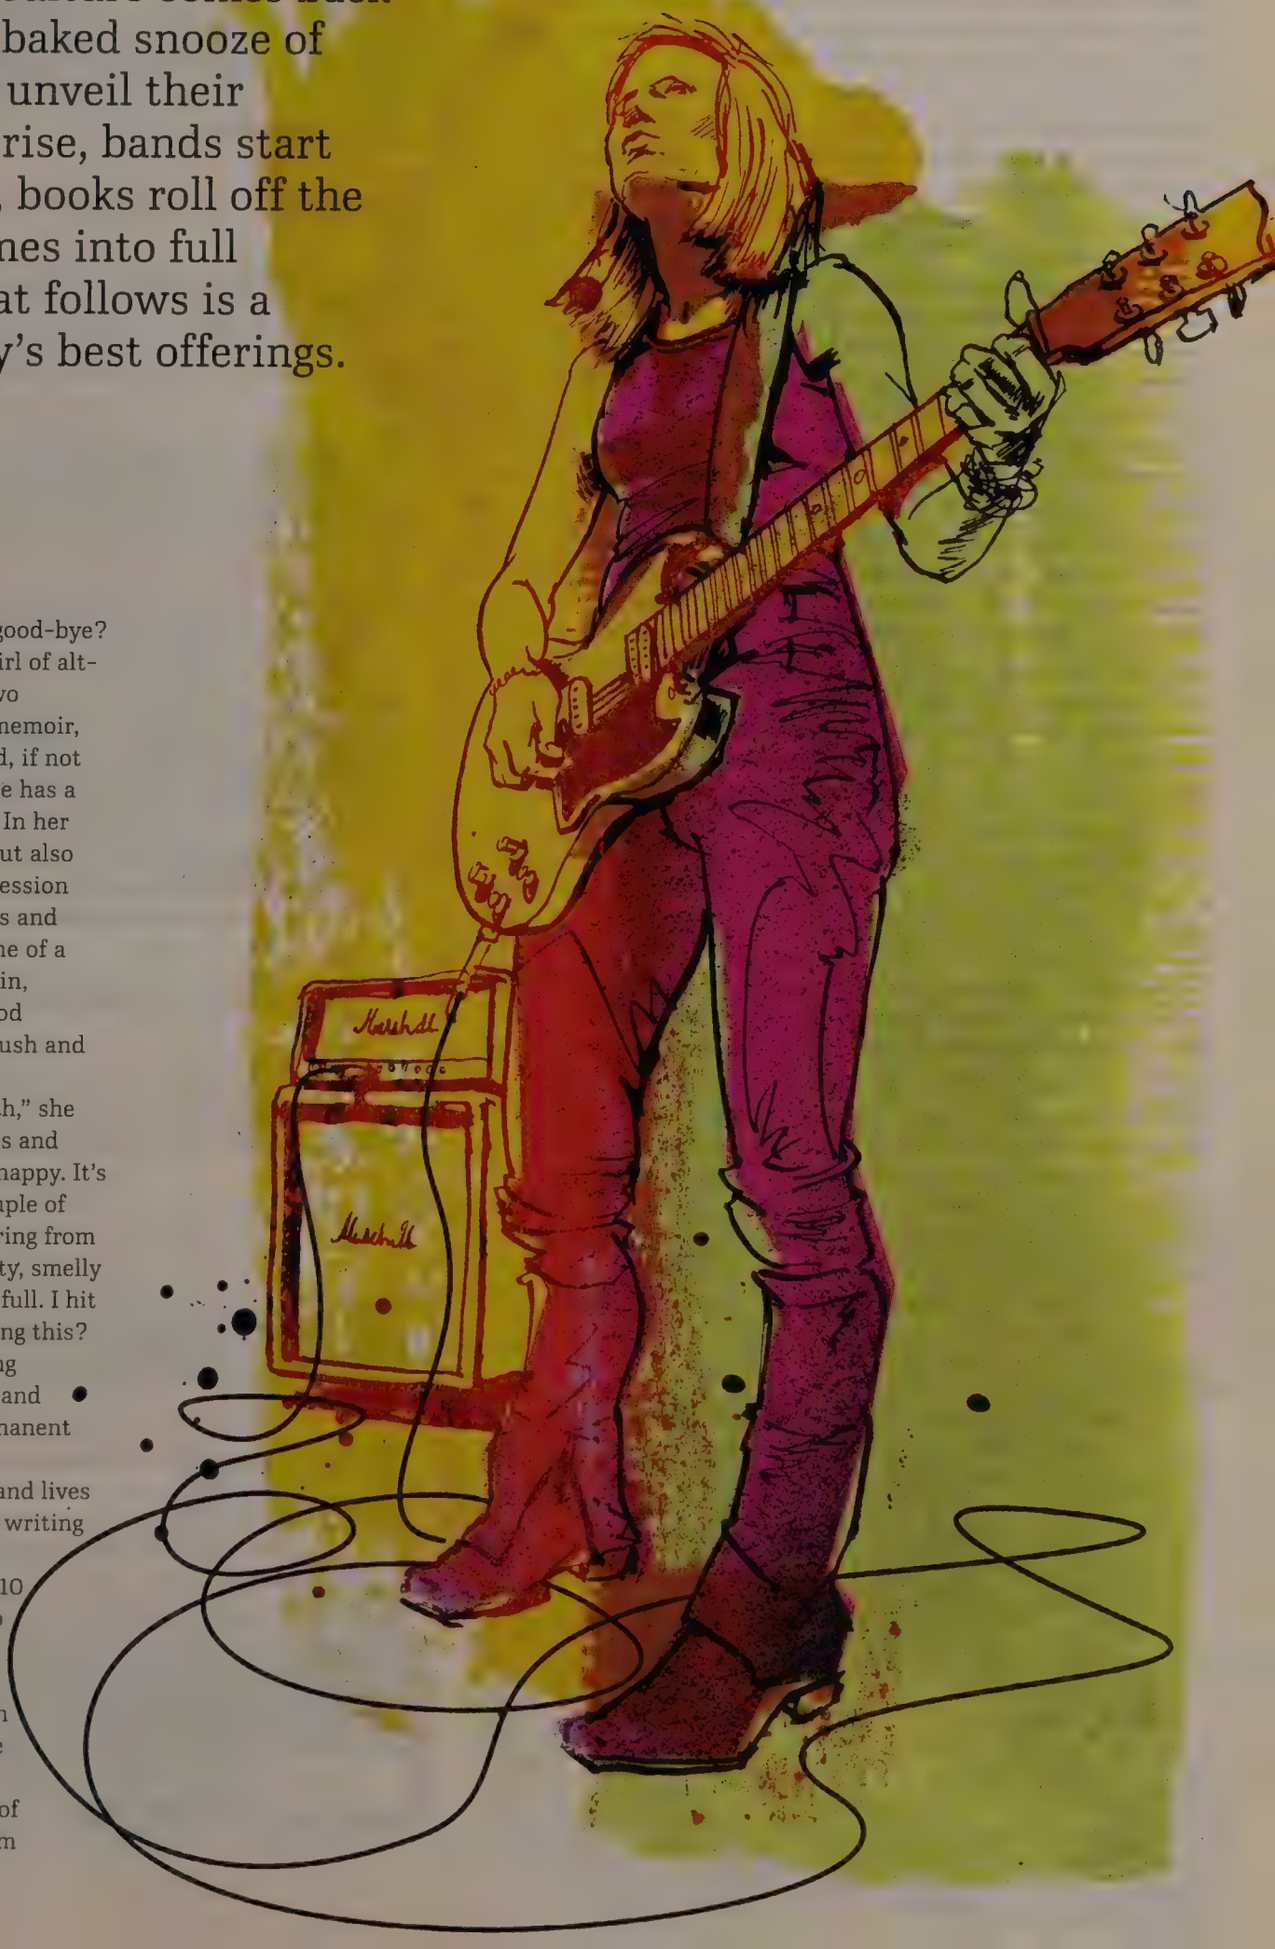
Fall

SPRING IS ONLY the season of rebirth if you're a vegetable. For human beings, fall is the real time of renewal, when our culture comes back to life after the sunbaked snooze of summer. Museums unveil their treasures, curtains rise, bands start their sound checks, books roll off the presses. Boston comes into full artistic bloom. What follows is a sampling of our city's best offerings.



Music

Is Juliana Hatfield saying hello or good-bye? At 41, Hatfield—the one-time "it" girl of alt-rock—has been making music for two decades. She's written a reflective memoir, When I Grow Up, about her rise and, if not fall, descent in the business, and she has a new CD called How to Walk Away. In her book, she tells amusing, wry tales but also wrestles with shyness, clinical depression and her place in the world. Gorgeous and lush, the album considers the decline of a relationship into lies, loneliness, pain, unbearable hurt, breakup. "It's a good combination," Hatfield observes. "Lush and painful. It hurts so good."

So is it hello or good-bye? "It's both," she says. "Saying hello to more happiness and good-bye to things that made me unhappy. It's a conundrum. I came to a point a couple of years ago where I thought about retiring from touring, from playing those same dirty, smelly rock clubs that were sometimes half full. I hit the wall. Do I really want to keep doing this? I don't think so if conditions are going to be like this. I need to take a break and contemplate if the break will be permanent or not."

Hatfield, who grew up in the area and lives in Cambridge, took a year away from writing music but returned after a breakup that influenced some of the 10 songs on the CD. "It was good to step away from the grind," she says. "It gave me a real feeling of freedom. I still love music, but I want to do it on my own terms." She plays the Brattle Theatre Sept. 14 with a full band as part of a short tour. "I do feel a kind of renewed life inside me," she says. "I'm looking forward to playing."

Hot picks

At the arena level, an industry insider quips that fall is all about "old gals, old guys and new kids." At the TD Banknorth Garden, that translates to Madonna (Oct. 15 & 16) and Tina Turner (Nov. 16 & 17), who both try to prove that their music and choreography are sexy and ageless. Janet Jackson and LL Cool J (Oct. 1), although a bit younger, probably share those goals. The Who (Pete Townshend, Roger Daltrey) put together another energetic live show on Oct. 24—truly, a meditation on youth, aging and rocking. The new kids are, of course, the New Kids on the Block (Sept. 26 & 28), who aren't even close to being kids, since some of them are parents. Another old guy, the tireless Neil Young, plays Farm Aid, along with Willie Nelson, Dave Matthews, Kenny Chesney, Steve Earle, the Pretenders and too many others to mention (Sept. 20) at the Comcast Center. Coldplay (Oct. 29) is at the Garden. The Orpheum has Jackson Browne (Sept. 16), Alanis Morissette (Sept. 20), Ben Folds (Sept. 26), Lucinda Williams (Oct. 8), Joe Satriani with Mountain (Oct. 14), Alice Cooper (Oct. 25), The Hold Steady with Drive-by Truckers (Nov. 9) and Kings of Leon (Nov. 12). The Somerville Theatre has Sam Philips (Sept. 13) and Billy Bragg (Oct. 21 & 22). Lindsey Buckingham is at Berklee Performance Center (Oct. 17), followed by Joan Baez (Nov. 1 & 2). The Wilbur Theatre hosts The Dandy Warhols (Sept. 16), Old 97's (Oct. 5), TV on the Radio (Oct. 13) and Broken Social Scene (Oct. 26). The Boston Symphony Orchestra features guest conductor André Previn (Oct. 2-4 & 7). The Handel and Haydn Society starts off with a Handel program (Oct. 3 & 5), before shifting to Beethoven and Mozart (Nov. 7 & 9). Opera Boston launches its season (Oct. 17, 19 & 21) at the Cutler Majestic Theatre with Der Freischütz.

Hip-Hop and R&B

The Middle East Upstairs hosts The 2008 Back to School Battle (Sept. 17), featuring 16 rappers facing five judges to win a $500 top prize. The club also has Termanology (Oct. 4), as well as 7L + Esoteric, Akrobatik, Reks and DJ Statik Selektah. And there's Jedi Mind Tricks, Outerspace and Reef the Lost Cauze on the A History of Violence Tour (Oct. 24). The Roots play Worcester's Palladium with Gym Class Heroes (Oct. 30). R&B auteur Maxwell rocks the Opera House (Oct. 8). Foxwoods has Alicia Keys (Sept. 12) and Ashanti (Oct. 3). N.E.R.D. and Common share the bill at the Orpheum (Oct. 1).

Jazz

At Regattabar, the Dave Holland Sextet has six shows in three nights (Sept. 18–20). Dee Dee Bridgewater is there (Oct. 3 & 4), while Bjorkestra interprets the Icelandic singer's music (Oct. 23). Top shows at Scullers include veteran band Oregon (Sept. 11), pianist Eldar (Sept. 18) and trumpeter Roy Hargrove (Oct. 3 & 4).

World

The Gypsy septet Kal mixes music tunes from Eastern Europe and the Middle East at the Somerville Theatre (Sept. 19). Al Kindî & the Whirling Dervishes of Damascus merge the sacred and earthly in classical Arab music at Sanders Theatre (Sept. 20). Ali Farka Touré's son Vieux Farka Touré continues to explore the sounds of Mali at the Somerville Theatre (Sept. 27). The Ditson Festival of Contemporary Music, led by Boston Modern Orchestra Project artistic director Gil Rose, is at the Institute of Contemporary Art (Sept. 18-21).

Performing Arts

It probably won't shock you to see Vlad Tepes—the sadistic ruler and Romanian icon upon whom Bram Stoker based Dracula—make an appearance in a show set in Romania. But it might be surprising to see him resurrected in Anne Washburn's new mouthful of a play, The Communist Dracula Pageant by Americans, for Americans, With Hallucinations, Phosphorescence and Bears. It's at the American Repertory Theatre's Zero Arrow Theatre Oct. 18–Nov. 9.

Played by Will LeBow, the 15th-century nationalist and psychopath isn't the star of this production. Instead, Vlad turns up in the late 20th century to counsel corrupt Romanian ruler Nicolae Ceausescu (Thomas Derrah) and his wife, Elena (Karen MacDonald). After reigning for nearly a quarter-century, they're toppled from power, tried for genocide (among other niceties) and executed—all in the space of six December days in 1989. Grim stuff. But consider the play's title. Obviously, there's unpleasantness in the plot, but that's not all that's going on.

"It's a wild ride," says director Anne Kauffman, who previously collaborated with Washburn on The Ladies, a play about the wives of dictators. (Yes, the two 40-year-old women do share an odd bond, Kauffman admits.) She describes The Communist Dracula Pageant as a "wry twist of genres." The play veers far from linearity, though it uses transcripts from the Ceausescus' trial. There's music, dancing, fantasy, comedy, vaudeville and, says Kauffman, "the blurring of real and not real. There's absurdity, spectacle. It's a collage piece."

The pageantry is two-fold. There's the revolution, "an expression," Kauffman says, "of how we as Americans perceive this particular revolution, which was the first televised revolution." And then there's a grand, costly pageant that the Ceausescus staged in 1976, when much of the country was mired in poverty and lacking basics like electricity. "The pageant is a great metaphor," says Kauffman. "Their reign is pageant-like, a celebration of ego."

Hot picks

After more than a year and a half on Broadway, Legally Blonde the Musical hits the road. First stop: the Opera House in Boston (Oct. 28–Nov. 9), starring the New York understudy, Becky Gulsvig, in the lead role of Elle. In adapting the movie to the stage, songwriting husband-and-wife team Larry O'Keefe and Nell Benjamin were told "to embody the movie's spirit and do whatever necessary to put it up on stage," O'Keefe says. "Our mandate was to be faithful in terms of tone and characters and let them spill loudly in song. I think the message we came up with is about pride. Every character has an attribute that is also their biggest obstacle... Our show has been tarred with a brush of silliness; I think it has some self-honesty. You look past the 'pinkness' and the message is you have to work on yourself or you will stagnate." Tom Stoppard's 2006 play Rock 'n' Roll, at the Huntington Theatre Company's Boston University Theatre (Nov. 7–Dec. 7), "is one of his best pieces of writing," says the Huntington's artistic director Peter DuBois. "It's a meaty play for actors, and includes unbelievable music—from the Rolling Stones to Pink Floyd to U2—sending a jolt of energy through the drama of the story." Beginning as Russian tanks roll into Prague in 1968 and ending with the Velvet Revolution of 1989, the story follows a young Czech PhD student who challenges the regime and clashes with his British Marxist professor. The Lyric Stage Company boasts the New England premiere of David Mamet's timely November (Oct. 17–Nov. 15). Set just before a presidential election, incumbent Charles H. P. Smith (Richard Snee) learns that he doesn't have the funds to fully campaign or build the obligatory legacy library. Smith's frustrated by the job, saying "too much stress, too little opportunity for cash." His idea: Raise money during Thanksgiving and the annual presidential turkey pardon. Scenes include a televised lesbian wedding and doings at an American-Indian casino on Nantucket. Pulitzer- and Tony-nominated writer/performer Anna Deavere Smith is, among other things, a channeler. In her Let Me Down Easy, at the A.R.T.'s Loeb Drama Center (Sept. 12–Oct. 11), Smith's one-woman show concerns human frailty and courage. Over the course of the play, she steps into more than 30 roles, among them Lance Armstrong and late Texas governor Ann Richards. David Parker and the Bang Group bring back Nut/Cracked, Parker's fractured take on the Tchaikovsky dance extravaganza at the Calderwood Pavilion (Oct. 22–26). Boston Ballet launches its season Oct. 16 at the Citi Performing Arts Center at the Wang Theatre with Cinderella, the old story made fresh with art-deco scenery and Roaring Twenties costuming by choreographer James Kudelka. (It premiered here in 2005 to rave reviews.)

Museums

Tara Donovan, 38, likes paper plates, straws, Styrofoam cups and Scotch tape. The New Yorker makes art from such things. You might say Donovan "grows" her work out of found objects. She has her first major retrospective, with 17 pieces at the Institute of Contemporary Art Oct. 10–Jan. 4.

"When I begin working with a given material, I don't necessarily have a strict idea of the form it will take or how it will relate to space," Donovan says in an e-mail interview. "As my process continues and the experimentations take on a larger scale, I begin to catch glimpses of possible outcomes that I can then exploit. For example, 'Untitled (Plastic Cups)' took on a variety of different forms in the studio that resulted from experiments with stacking and horizontal distribution. Eventually, as with my other projects, a transformative moment occurs for me when the material ceases to reference itself and begins to take on a formal structure."

She knows some people think her work concerns waste, environmental issues and recycling. "I don't really make these connections when making my work," she says. "It is the material itself—the fact that it participates and is somehow symbolic in reference to human waste and decadent consumption—that leads people to fixate on these types of associations. In a sense, I see my practice as a subversion of the normal cycles of distribution, consumption and waste. In the same way that other sculptors use iron or bronze, I just happen to use mass-produced materials that are readily available to me. Inevitably, my work is a product of consumer culture and therefore relates to the daily activities of people living in our society. The fact that a poetic statement can result from these associations is another layer of complexity that takes on significance for me when a given project is completed."

Take a look at Donovan's sculptures, and you'll get a sense of grandeur but also wonder about construction. "This response of 'How did you do it?' or 'How long did it take?'—questions of disbelief—is very common when people first encounter my work. The sheer volume of material amassed is often very disorienting for some viewers. It isn't necessarily my intention to bring attention to the labor involved in each work. For me, the labor is no different than taking brush to canvas or carving a piece of wood—it is a means to an end."

Art and Empire: Treasures From Assyria in the British Museum "does dwell on brutality and ferocity," says Larry Berman, curator of the exhibit at the Museum of Fine Arts. "Cities besieged, enemies impaled on spikes, you see these great monsters and demons there to protect the king's palace, lion-headed men with birds' feet. It's amazingly fearsome and fantastic. I think this will trigger people's imagination." The 250 artifacts in the exhibit (Sept. 21–Jan. 4, 2009) are drawn mainly from excavation by British archeologists in the 1840s and '50s. Also at the MFA (Sept. 23–Jan. 19, 2009) are many of Yousuf Karsh's famous photo portraits, in commemoration of his 100th birthday. Karsh, who reportedly considered Boston his spiritual home, shot Winston Churchill, Audrey Hepburn, Pablo Picasso, Georgia O'Keefe, Helen Keller, Albert Einstein and more. In his autobiography, Karsh, who died in 2002, wrote about his "endless fascination" with "their inward power... the elusive secret that hides in everyone." The Museum of Science has two intriguing exhibits on tap: Goose Bumps! The Science of Fear (Oct. 12) and Mythic Creatures: Dragons, Unicorns & Mermaids (Oct. 26). The former considers a myriad of phobias, including pyro-, avio- and dento-. The latter presents kids' favorite beasts: griffons, dragons and the like. At the Isabella Stewart Gardner Museum, Luisa Rabbia's video photomontage of Stewart's photos—Travels with Isabella, Travel Scrapbooks, 1883/2008—is up through Sept. 28. Beginning Oct. 16, The Triumph of Marriage: Painted Cassoni of the Renaissance showcases painted wedding chests of that era.

Film

Just about a year ago, you may have strolled down Newbury Street and spotted yellow New York City cabs. "What?!" you probably thought. Well, Boston (not Toronto) was doubling for the Big Apple, as writer-director Diane English (Murphy Brown) shot her feature debut, The Women, opening Sept. 12. "We got a great tax break from the state of Massachusetts," English says. "We were given the red-carpet treatment. We love Boston."

"We" includes costars Meg Ryan and Annette Bening, who play best friends in the fashion and publishing worlds in English's rejiggering of the 1936 Clare Boothe Luce play and 1939 George Cukor film. "We" also includes Eva Mendes, Debra Messing, Jada Pinkett Smith, Bette Midler, Candice Bergen and a slew of others in an entirely female cast—as in the play and original movie. (Male characters are discussed; they just stay off-screen.)

English said there was pressure to add guys to the movie, but she didn't budge. One of her backers was a man, coproducer Mick Jagger, who, she says, "loved it and has been a great cheerleader for it." The challenge for English was to maintain the original productions' fast pace and quick wit, but modernize the movie, making it more of "a valentine for women." (The original was quite scathing.) "Women have so many options now," she explains. "We've broken so many barriers in the last 10 years. We can have it all. The question is 'Do we want it all?'"

With such a thoroughly female target audience, will men be persuaded to see it? "I don't think any men playing a round of golf are going to say, 'Let's grab a beer and go see The Women,' but if they do go with their girlfriends or wives, I think they're going to be pleasantly surprised at how lovingly portrayed they are. And it's a very funny film, which men really respond to. Plus Eva Mendes is in her underwear, so we've got something for everybody."

Hot picks

Joel and Ethan Coen's latest, Burn After Reading, a spy movie with Brad Pitt and Cambridge resident John Malkovich, hits theaters Sept. 12. Two Boston University grads and brothers, writer/director/actor Joshua and editor/soundman Ben Safdie, are behind the low-budget The Pleasure of Being Robbed, slated for a fall release. In it, Eleonore Hendricks plays a young, theft-prone, carefree drifter. My Best Friend's Girl, a comedy starring ex-local comic Dane Cook, along with Kate Hudson and Alec Baldwin, opens Sept. 19. Yes, you'll hear the Cars song for which the movie is titled. In Max Payne, a videogame adaptation, Boston College grad Chris O'Donnell (see page 34) plays opposite renegade cop Mark Wahlberg, who takes a nightmarish journey through the underworld to exact revenge on the people who killed his family and partner. It's out Oct. 17.

Also worth a mention, on Sept. 12 Robert De Niro and Al Pacino—together again!—track a vigilante serial killer in Righteous Kill. On Oct. 29, Oliver Stone unleashes W., his take on George W. Bush's wild and crazy ride from rich, inebriated frat boy to the most powerful man in the world. Josh Brolin plays the titular POTUS. Farther afield, Daniel Craig returns to the role of James Bond to traverse continents and battle enemies galore in The Quantum of Solace, out Nov. 14. Nicole Kidman and Hugh Jackman go Down Under for a romantic, action-adventure spectacle, set just as World War II is about to explode in Baz Luhrmann's Australia on Nov. 26. You last saw a Cormac McCarthy book on the big screen in the Coen brothers' award-winning No Country for Old Men. This year McCarthy's desolate, post-apocalyptic novel The Road hits theaters Nov. 26, featuring Viggo Mortensen. Gus Van Sant's Milk, about the martyred gay-rights activist Harvey Milk, stars Sean Penn and opens Nov. 26.

Books

Simon Rich, the 24-year-old author of the satirical and hilarious Ant Farm, says about his new collection of very short pieces, Free-Range Chickens, "If there's any theme, it's fear and doom, which is remarkably similar to the first book. Different kinds of fear—some small, some extreme. Everything from failing to get your money's worth at an all-you-can-eat-buffet to the legend of the Titanic, that the band kept playing, and nobody told 'em the boat was sinking. Once they find out, they are not happy." The book's title comes from a bit included in The New Yorker's "Shouts & Murmurs" column. In it, two free-range chickens discuss "another beautiful day in paradise," which ends as the farmer approaches and one bird replies, "Huh. Guess it's my turn to go into the thing," to which the other says, "Cool. See you later, buddy."

Rich, former Harvard Lampoon president (2005-06) and current Saturday Night Live writer, admits that while his attitude's consistent, he enjoys exploring not only his own foibles but also those of others—both people and creatures. Dalmatians on a firetruck: The dogs wonder, "Did they take us to the park this time?" Count Dracula: He poses as head of the Red Cross, tries to meet a date online, assuring readers of his humanity and signs his letters "Count Dracula." The apostles at the Last Supper: Jesus says one of them will betray him, but not who! Imagine their anxiety and angst.

"The way I write these pieces," Rich says, "is I write a ton and throw a lot against the wall and see what sticks over a couple of years. I end up with enough that I feel comfortable seeing them in the same book. They're cut from the same cloth." Essays range from five pages to a few lines. Main selling point? He thinks for a moment. "It's physically small," he says. "And easy to store." (Rich was slated for a book tour around this time, but it was scrapped because it's an election year, and the SNL writers were called in early. He hopes to squeeze in some Boston readings.)

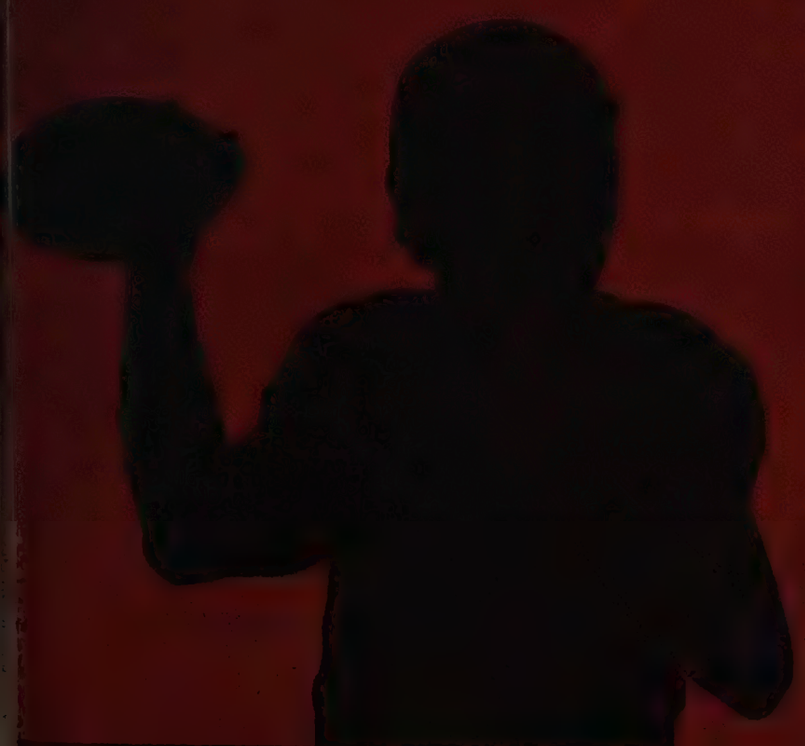
Local scribe Dennis Lehane—gritty crime author extraordinaire—returns with The Given Day. Taking a break from cops and robbers to focus solely on cops, particularly the Boston Police and the events preceding the 1919 strike, Lehane tackles a lot of ugly race, immigration and class issues in this 700-plus page historical novel. Oh, and Babe Ruth is in it, too. Lehane reads at the Coolidge Corner Theatre Sept. 23. Onetime Bostonian and author of Prep, Curtis Sittenfeld takes a few liberties in American Wife, a fictionalized portrait of Laura Bush. Medford native and UMass-Amherst grad Paul Theroux reads from Ghost Train to the Eastern Star: On the Tracks of the Great Railway Bazaar Sept. 22 at Harvard Bookstore. Tufts alum Gregory Maguire has A Lion Among Men, the third act in his Wicked series, out Oct. 14. The Widows of Eastwick, John Updike's sequel to his 1984 novel, hits shelves Oct. 21. And The Improper's own Andrew Rimas reads from Beef: The Untold Story of How Milk, Meat, and Muscle Shaped the World at Brookline Booksmith on Nov. 12.

Beyond the local landscape, some of the better-known authors with fall books include Julian Barnes (Nothing to be Frightened Of) at Brookline Booksmith on Sept. 26 and Sarah Vowell (The Wordy Shipmates), who's there Oct. 10 and at the First Parish Unitarian Church in Cambridge Oct. 11. Other releases include Irvine Welsh (Crime, Sept. 2), Thomas Friedman (Hot, Flat and Crowded, Sept. 8), Annie Proulx (Fine Just the Way It Is, Sept. 9), PD James (The Private Patient, Nov. 18), Philip Roth (Indignation, Sept. 16), James McPherson (Tried by War, Oct. 7), Art Spiegelman (Breakdowns, Oct. 7), Philip Norman (John Lennon: The Life, Oct. 28), Wally Lamb (The Hour I First Believed, Nov. 11), Toni Morrison (A Mercy, Nov. 11) and Malcolm Gladwell (Outliers, Nov. 18). ✖✖✖

THE ART OF WAR

A Patriots primer

By Nick Altschuller and Rich Levine



CHAPTER I

Making of Plans

The Patriots run a tight ship. General Belichick leads a fearless army comprising men who accept their roles without question. Until needed, plays are kept under wraps like nuclear secrets. Bulletin boards are tacked with propaganda. Misinformation is fed to the press, and intelligence is gathered by any means necessary. Every advantage must be taken if one wants to succeed because nobody's perfect.

It's not easy to be a fan either. Success has a price: unquestioned trust in the leaders, attacks from rival fan bases and torture, in the form of an endless barrage of reminders of one loss in the last campaign.

For both team and fan, victory will take skill and discipline, stoicism and preparation, and a shot for every reference to "Super Bowl champion Eli Manning." Skillful soldiers, this is the art of war. Let the march to supremacy begin.

CHAPTER II

Waging of War

The soldier wishing to wage war must first calculate the cost, and for Patriots Nation's more competitive/less fiscally responsible members, the battle against Vegas is always a dangerous one. Play it right, and your girl spends the winter dining at the Liberty Hotel. Make a wrong step, and it's back to the Liberty Bell Roast Beef in Southie—and Match.com—for you.

Here are a few facts to help you fight the good fight:

1. In their previous matchup against this season's opponents, the Pats are 6-10 against the spread.
2. The Pats have failed to cover in each of their last four games against the Colts.
3. Dating back to the Super Bowl season of 1996, the Patriots are a combined 8-2 against the spread vs. the Steelers. Pittsburgh comes to Gillette on Nov. 30. There goes that Thanksgiving check from granny.
4. New England plays four games this season in Tom Brady's native Pacific time zone—which is one more than they've played there during Brady's entire career. In those three games, the Pats are 1-2 against the spread.
5. Twice this season, the Patriots play road games in back-to-back weeks. Since 2003, New England is an amazing 9-1 against the spread in the second of consecutive road games.

CHAPTER III

Attack by Stratagem

How have the Patriots sustained their position of power over the past decade? The story begins and ends with the Belichickian philosophy under which they operate. The self is nonexistent. Team is everything.

Defensive end Jarvis Green represents all that's right about the Patriot Way. Although he's only started 11 games in his six seasons in New England, Green has appeared and contributed in 94 of the team's 96 matches during that time—the most of any player not named Tom Brady. We sat down with Jarvis as he prepares for season No. 7.

Improper Bostonian: What is it about the defensive line, as a unit, that makes you guys so consistently successful?

Jarvis Green: We've never had any selfishness between us. You know we're all young guys, we're about a year apart in age and we just keep working, man. We know it takes all of us to do the job if we're gonna get it done right. Not one of us, not two of us, but all of us.

IB: You guys lost a few names from last year's defense and will count on a few rookies to make an impact this season. You like what you've seen from the youngsters?

JG: I mean it's hard to say right now, man. Everyone's doing their share of the work. Training camp is training camp, but when the season starts things change. You can go out and have a great preseason, but once the real thing starts they become normal guys. So you can't say much until you see them in the season.

IB: Speaking of rookies, there's a running back in camp named BenJarvus Green-Ellis. Do you give him any crap for trying to hijack your name?

JG: Nah, I met him, and he's from New Orleans. He's a Louisiana guy, you know, so we sort of grew up with the same surroundings and things like that. So I don't give him any crap about it.

IB: You're still young, but you're also a veteran now. How do you see your role as a mentor to these younger guys?

JG: Really, I just be me. I try to crack a lot of jokes. Keep things alive. The way I lead is to just do what I have to do. Watch film, keep my body right and help the new guys coming in, just like veterans like Anthony Pleasant, Bobby Hamilton and Rick Lyle did for me.

IB: What's on your iPod before games?

JG: I haven't put anything on yet for this season, but for games last year I had a lot of Kanye West on there.

IB: You guys ready to welcome Brett Favre to the AFC East?

JG: Yeah, we get him twice now. It's gonna be fun. You know with him in New York and Pennington down in Miami, our division just got a lot better real quickly.

IB: All right, last one. Give us one positive outcome or lesson learned from the Super Bowl XLII?

JG: We've just gotta play 60 minutes, man. We played for 58 or 59 minutes in that game, and it wasn't enough.

CHAPTER IV

Tactical Positioning

Invincibility lies with oneself—and the ability to recognize an opponent's vulnerability. Here's a brief breakdown of the potential strengths and weaknesses of the Pats' six fiercest rivals.

MIAMI DOLPHINS:
Strengths: Bill Parcells' vision; Joey Porter's intensity; Ricky Williams' weed access Weaknesses: Chad Pennington's weak arm; Ronnie Brown's bum knee; Parcells' bear-claw expense account

NEW YORK JETS:
Strengths: Patriot "guts"; Brett Favre on a mission; revamped offensive line
Weaknesses: Depth; Brett Favre on a mission; head coach is a eunuch

BUFFALO BILLS:
Strengths: The Buffalo Faithful; revamped defense; Marshawn Lynch's wheels
Weaknesses: Experience; passing attack; the Buffalo Faithful's collective blood pressure

INDIANAPOLIS COLTS:
Strengths: Bob Sanders; Bill Polian's shenanigans; Tony Dungy's mustache
Weaknesses: Dwight Freeney's foot; Peyton Manning's knee; Marvin Harrison's six-shooter

SAN DIEGO CHARGERS:
Strengths: LT's skills; Philip Rivers' leadership; Shawne Merriman's HGH
Weaknesses: LT's heart; Norv Turner's brain; Merriman's knee

PITTSBURGH STEELERS:
Strengths: WRs Hines Ward and Santonio Holmes; LBs James Farrior and James Harrison; identical twins Mike Tomlin and Omar Epps
Weaknesses: Anthony Smith's mouth; Willie Parker's leg; hoagies filled with French fries

CHAPTER V

Energy

All's fair in war, and winning armies use that to their advantage. New England fans love the deviousness. Sports Illustrated's Chris Ballard gives an insider's look and shares the view from the other side.

IB: As a member of the media, how do you feel about Belichick's evasiveness and games with injury reports?

CB: As someone who writes columns, I love all those elements of Belichick because they make him exquisitely hateable. And sports needs villains. That he takes himself so seriously only adds to it. Now, if I were in Boston trying to cover the guy every day? Surely it would be a huge pain in the ass.

The Improper's Top 5 Most Riveting Belichick Quotes From 2007

5. Dec. 19—"One of the things that we've done a good job of is not turning the ball over, and that's always good."
4. Oct. 21—"Tom has played some pretty good football for us, and he played well today."
3. Nov. 12—"We'll make a decision whenever we have to make a decision, whatever point that is."
2. Dec. 10—"We try to play our best game out there every week and we try to win every week, so we're going to try to win this week."

Sept. 23—"Being aggressive and trying to make plays is good. Being careless and not taking care of the ball is bad."

QB: Why are coaches so miserly and cautious with their trick plays?

CB: I think because when trick plays don't work, they really don't work—like a loss of 10 on a reverse or a fumble or an ugly interception. And they leave a coach open to lots of second-guessing. Plus, coaches like to see themselves as serious men involved in serious business, and trick plays are, by definition, quite unserious.

The Improper's Top 5 Trick Plays of the Brady Era

Oct. 21, 2001: Pats @ Indy
In only the fourth start of Brady's career, David Patten was a magician. He caught a TD, ran for a TD and, our favorite of the day, also threw a 60-yard bomb to Troy Brown. Patten actually threw as many TDs as Peyton Manning as the Pats cruised, 38-17.

Dec. 22, 2001: Pats vs. Dolphins
It was the day the Pats clinched their first division title of the Brady era (final score: 20-13). It was also the day the then-unproven QB caught a pass from Kevin Faulk and rumbled down the sidelines for 23 yards. Not sure we'll ever see that one again.

Feb. 1, 2004: Pats vs. Panthers
This one didn't have a great degree of difficulty, but the direct snap to Kevin Faulk for the two-point conversion to tie Super Bowl XXXVIII in the fourth quarter gets the sentimental nod here. The Pats, of course, triumphed, 32-29.

Nov. 7, 2004: Pats @ Rams
The Pats come out to attempt a third quarter field goal, but a sneaky Troy Brown never enters the huddle and stands, unnoticed, by the sidelines. Adam Vinatieri takes the direct snap and throws it to a wide open Brown for six. Said Mike Martz after the game: "Wahhhh!! Waaaaaaahhhh!" Pats won, 40-22.

Dec. 10, 2007: Pats vs. Steelers
Brady to Moss to Brady to Gaffney. This one loses points because Gaffney wasn't even that open when he made the catch, but the sheer mess, and ultimate success, of the play makes it endearing. It helps that, once again, the Pats won, 34-13.

CHAPTER VI

Empty and Full

Empty armies are scared, hungry and tired. Full armies are courageous, strong, a bit tipsy, a little gassy and kinda sleepy, so sometimes they miss the kickoff. Skillful tailgate warriors can prepare this AFC-themed feast in honor of, and in preparation for, dominance.

MIAMI HORS D'OEUVRE
Skewered tuna—with cilantro purée and a blood-orange reduction—caught in dolphin-unsafe nets.

NEW YORK APPETIZER
A team of greens with carrots, tomatoes and other useless add-ons, topped with aged Wisconsin cheddar and toasted Favre beans.

BUFFALO ENTRÉE
Bison burgers, washed down with 40s of Steel Reserve (Pittsburgh), Crazy Horse (Denver) and Colt 45 (Indy), which can be combined with Sparks energy booze (San Diego) for a pre-battle grog called the Boot 'n' Rally that'll have you ready to run through a brick wall, once you wake up.

CHAPTER VII

The Fray

General Belichick can handle his troops on the field, but for fans, the parking lot and stands are the battleground and trash talk is the weapon of choice. Remember, the skillful soldier avoids the keen spirit (people bigger than you), attacks the dull (Jets fans) and confronts keg-fueled chaos with discipline (and beer).

Attack: An opposing fan accuses Tom Brady of being a bit of a pretty boy.

Volley: There's no getting around this one, not when your QB is posing in fashion mags and getting shout-outs from Coldplay. Good news: Giants fans can't say much because Eli Manning looks like he fell off, and was subsequently run over by, the turnip truck. Peyton Manning is even more ubiquitous than Brady, so Colts followers have nothing, plus it's hard to hear them over the fake crowd noise. And if Jets fans talk smack, remind them that "Broadway Joe" popularized fur coats on the sidelines, shaved his legs and wore pantyhose.

Attack: The Pats cheat.

Volley: Amidst all the conjecture, we forgot the words of another important text, "Judge not, lest ye be judged." Or, from the Book of Ray Lewis, "No one likes a snitch." Deep down, Jets fans know they're on the wrong end of this attack. Were this the playground, Mangini would have nary a nipple left to nurple. In a better world, Arlen Specter would waste the government's time enforcing the rules of the schoolyard. No tattling.

Attack: 18-1!

Volley: Now we turn to the monks of Shaolin. Rather than tiger or crane, you're going to want to adopt armadillo style. Fall to the ground and tuck your head toward your knees. In other martial arts this is known as the fetal position (fetal being Sanskrit for "wrath of the sun god"). Use your shins, spine and skull to parry blows and protect the tender black cavity where your heart used to beat.

CHAPTER VIII

Variations in Tactics

When opportunities present themselves to meet and gain allies, one should take them. It only increases overall strength. With the bounty of new soldiers available in each draft, General Belichick and Colonel Pioli have the chance to right any roster wrongs. This summer, the linebacking and secondary corps got the biggest facelifts. Here's a look at a few of the new enlistees.

Linebacker
Jerod Mayo, LB, Tennessee
Drafted: Round 1, Pick 10
6'1", 242 lbs, 22 years old
As the story goes, the Patriots brought Mayo in for a pre-draft interview, and Belichick was sold the second the kid sat down. At press time, Mayo's penciled in as a starter at inside linebacker, which is all you need to know about our expectations. Starting—as a rookie—on a Bill Belichick defense is like a grasshopper snatching the pebble on his first try.

Shawn Crable, LB, Michigan
Drafted: Round 3, Pick 78
6'5", 243 lbs, 23 years old
As with Mayo, the Pats selected Crable to help liven up a slightly senior-citizen linebacking crew. Expect to see #98 mostly on running downs (at least to start) and for many a commentator to publicly (and hysterically!) make note of how much his last name sounds like Vrabel.

Secondary
Terrence Wheatley, CB
Drafted: Round 2, Pick 62
5'9", 183 lbs, 23 years old
Coming into the draft, scouts were calling Wheatley "one of the fastest guys in college football" and "a future shut down NFL corner." So why was he available in the second round? For one, he's a little small at 5'9". Second, his right wrist has been surgically repaired more times than Owen Wilson's nose (Hey oh!). Still, don't be surprised if Wheatley's play this season conjures up memories of the man who's number he stole—former #22 Asante Samuel.

CHAPTER IX

Army on the March

Upon understanding the tactics, one can choose a goal and march. In football, the goal is easy: Win. The march, however, is less a choice and more a bite down on a stick and a prayer that the schedule makers are kind. Here's how you'll be spending your next 17 Sundays.

Week 1, Sun., Sept. 7,
1 pm, Chiefs
What the Chefs (great googly moogly!) lack in pizzazz, they make up for with their . . . um . . . valid 55-man roster. Pats win, 35-17.

Week 2, Sun., Sept. 14
4:15 pm at Jets
Famous for screaming at female fans to "Show us your t-ts!" the Jets faithful are stunned when nose tackle Vince Wilfork hears the calls and delivers his goods. There's also some talk of the Jets sporting a new quarterback. Pats win a squeaker, 17-16.

Week 3, Sun., Sept. 21
1 pm, Dolphins
Bill Parcells coached the Pats 12 years ago. Does anyone care anymore? Regardless, get ready for a full week of bad tuna puns in the headlines. Pats win, 37-10.

Week 4, BYE WEEK
Brady & Co. take the week off, but a prediction is still in order. Number of times the word "oversexed" will be used in this section? Twice.

Week 5, Sun., Oct. 5
4:15 pm at 49ers
The Pats head to San Fran for the first time since 1995. On that afternoon, Steve Young threw three TDs as the 49ers rolled 28-7. Expect a similar outcome . . . only the exact opposite. The Pats somehow keep Young in check and win, 28-7.

Week 6, Sun., Oct. 12
8:15 pm at Chargers
The biggest game of the Chargers young season gets off to a rough start when LaDainian Tomlinson is knocked out in the first quarter with what he calls an "ouchie on his elbow." LT triumphantly returns in the fourth quarter—with the game out of reach—and scores two meaningless TDs in a 37-24 loss.

Week 7, Mon., Oct. 20
8:30 pm, Broncos
The Patriots hard-fought 24-21 win is overshadowed when broadcaster Tony Kornheiser shocks a national TV audience by delivering his cheesy pre-game comments while riding on the back of two midgets inside a horse costume. Says Kornheiser: "Please, just look at me!"

Week 8, Sun., Oct. 26
1 pm, Rams
The Rams celebrate Halloween early by showing up in Foxborough dressed like a halfway respectable team. They lead late, until Brady directs a nine-play, 53-yard drive in the final 1:30 to set up a game-winning 48-yard field goal. Pats, 20-17.

Week 9, Sun., Nov. 2
8:15 pm at Colts
Fully healed from his infected sac removal, Peyton Manning is ready with guns blazing. But they'll be coming off a short week as the Patriots are rounding into midseason form. Pats, 27-21.

Week 10, Sun., Nov. 9
1 pm, Bills
Ooh, the Bills are around .500! They're talented, hungry and dangerous! This is a classic trap game! Enough already. Pats, 33-13.

Week 11, Thu., Nov. 13
8:15 pm, Jets
Four days later, the Pats head into Storyline Bowl II, a game packed with so many hackneyed clichés that Bill Simmons crashes the Internet, Rachel Nichols goes into seizures and Peter King orgasms on-air. A little tired, the Patriots drop one, 17-21.

Week 12, Sun., Nov. 23
1 pm at Dolphins
In a case of life imitating art, Dolphins' QB Chad Pennington and team mascot Snowflake III are kidnapped a week before the game. A defiant Bill Parcells tells the kidnapper, "Keep 'em," and the inspired Dolphins only lose by 21. Pats, 30-9.

Week 13, Sun., Nov. 30
4:15 pm, Steelers
Willie Parker gashes the defense and the Pats let one slip away, 20-24, leading to the annual rite of Steelers fans feeling unjustifiably superior until we beat them again in the playoffs.

Week 14, Sun., Dec. 7
8:15 pm at Seahawks
If you took any Seahawks before the fourth round in your fantasy draft, congratulations: you lose 28-14, Pats.

Week 15, Sun., Dec. 14
4:15 pm at Raiders
AKA BYE WEEK II. Pats win, 38-12.

Week 16, Sun., Dec. 21
1 pm at Cardinals
The oversexed Matt Leinart throws three picks to the Pats (!) who later find disgruntled Cardinals wide receiver Anquan Boldin hiding under some coats. Sorry, buddy, maybe next year. Pats, 36-16.

Week 17, Sun., Dec. 28
1 pm at Bills
Cassel to Aiken! Feel the excitement! Winning 16-14, the Pats end the regular season 14-2.

CHAPTER X

Terrain

Awareness of the terrain gives you an advantage in battle. So we considered launching an investigation into Belichick's "creative turf management." But ultimately, we feared that digging too deep could bury us beneath it. Instead we offer Patriot Place.

If you haven't heard of PP, it's been a while since you visited Gillette. The 1.3 million-square-foot development, which wreaked havoc on game day operations for the last two years, has finally opened. And if Kraft and Co. have their way, it'll have you heading to Foxborough a lot more than 8 to 10 times a year. It's got just about everything you need to have yourself a nice little Saturday. There's a movie theater, retailers and restaurants including the Blue Fin Lounge and Davio's.

But there's one attraction we'd like to personally endorse: The Hall at Patriot Place. The 4,500-square-foot shrine to everything Patriots boasts a 150-seat panoramic theater, four 30-foot tall interactive video pylons honoring Patriot Hall of Famers and, best of all, a geodesic dome that greets visitors with a snow squall experience as they're taken back to Adam Vinatieri's legendary kick in the Snow Bowl. If you're interested in more information on the game, give Charles Woodson a call. He's probably still bitching about it.

CHAPTER XI

The Nine Situations

In any campaign, there are hurdles on the path to victory: inclement weather, injuries, Duane Starks. Preparation is the key to overcoming any obstacle. So study hard, and soon you'll be more relaxed than Nick Kaczur after a re-up.

Situation 1: In the opener, Tedy Bruschi clutches his chest, Rodney Harrison breaks a hip and Mike Vrabel catches gout. All are put on the PUP list with "a case of the olds."

Response: Unable to lure Junior Seau out of retirement, the Patriots shore up their defense by signing Steve Nelson, Andre Tippett and Fred Smerlas, who ends each Big Show by predicting Patriots by 50.

Situation 2: The Belichick sex tape actually exists.

Response: The Two Girls, One Cup approach. Have a shameless friend watch it and warn you of anything too deviant. If necessary, place a comforting cutout (Voltron, Frankenberry) over the appropriate place onscreen. Under no circumstances touch yourself.

Situation 3: Matt Walsh films you sleeping.

Response: Just lie still and let it happen. This is not a man whose bad side you want to meet. If you must, mumble something about Romeo Crennel being a double agent and enjoy the headlines in the next day's Boston Herald.

Situation 4: Brady goes down.

Response: Welcome the Matt Cassel era with open arms. No, seriously folks, we've planned for this. Canned goods to the left, potable water to the right. If you're not in the fallout shelter by the time the hatch closes, may God have mercy on you.

Situation 5: Stephen Gostkowski develops a case of Scott Sisson foot.

Response: Al Del Greco.

Situation 6: TMZ claims that Tom Brady is the biological father of Brangelina's most recently adopted child.

Response: No soldier worth his salt would waste time with such Internet drivel. Now man up and check that fantasy team again.

Situation 7: A rejuvenated Brett Favre leads the Jets on a regular season for the ages. New York wins the AFC East.

Response: Wait patiently for the fourth quarter of a tight playoff game. Allow a heartbreaking interception to restore world order.

Situation 8: A Colts scout is caught videotaping a Patriots practice.

Response: Smile contentedly as Belichick releases a statement: "No shit. We've been taping you taping us all season! You really thought you were putting one by the Sweatshirt?"

Situation 9: Word leaks that regardless of this season's outcome, Tom Brady will be featured on the cover of Madden '10.

Response: Amass equal parts gasoline and frozen orange juice concentrate. Download "Where Is My Mind?" by the Pixies and blueprints of EA Sports headquarters.

CHAPTER XII

Attack by Fire

In 2007, nothing in the NFL (with apologies to Jeff Garcia's "girlfriend") was hotter than the Patriots offense. But will the fire burn as bright in 2008? Albert Breer, NFL writer at Sporting News, thinks the offense should be just fine, but we enlsited his help to break down five potential developments that could determine just how dominant they might be.

1. Protect the Franchise: "One of the themes of last season was opponents' unwillingness to be creative in rush packages and/or jam Patriot receivers at the line. The teams that were, were able to get in Brady's face and throw off the timing. They could do it because they were facing an array of 'light' personnel groupings that prevented New England from going into max protect."

2. Running Men: "While the running game wound up with a respectable 1,849 yards last season, inconsistency was a problem. In seven of the club's last 11 regular-season games, they failed to hit four yards per carry, and in three of their final six games, the average was three or lower. The Pats should have greater commitment to that area in 2008, as their lack of a consistent ground game hurt the prolific aerial attack in the end, as the Giants were able to tee off."

3. In Good Health: "The offense had a remarkable run of good health in 2007—its five Pro Bowlers missed a total of one game. If you're approximating the kind of off-the-charts production New England had in 2007, you need that kind of luck."

4. Starring David: "On the surface, there really isn't a whole lot to go on with David Thomas, who's played in just 17 games since the Patriots drafted him in 2006. But if you watched him at Texas, it's clear what a smooth, natural receiver he is. Health is the caveat here. If he can stay on the field, he could shore up a problem with the '07 offense, depth at tight end, and make the offense less predictable and, perhaps, more effective running the ball."

5. Consistent Front: "While on the whole, the Patriots offensive line had an outstanding 2007—save for the Super Bowl—there are kinks in the armor. For one, Brady is, now more than ever, their best friend, buying time with his feet the way few can. Still, as the Giants showed, there's only so much he can do when things disintegrate. A better running game would give the offense more balance, and not limit Brady to shorter drops."

The Use of Spies

You know what? We'll leave this one to the professionals. After all, Arlen Specter needs to do something with his time. ***

Langston Fishburne dances circles around other students' style.

PRACTICING HIS PIROUETTES on Boston Ballet's marley floors, 21-year-old Langston Fishburne is uniformly clad in black. And frankly, he has no say in the matter. So when Fishburne's not taking the stage in spandex, slippers and tights, he's rebelling on Boston University's campus in bold colors, adventurous prints and dazzling accessories. Standing out in a group of 32,500 students is a cinch when you wear Versace snakeskin pants to Psych 101. We sat down to discuss his separate fashion worlds.

Improper Bostonian: How would you describe your style?
Langston Fishburne: My style is a mix of casual and formal wear with a special attention [to] accessories. I want some things to stand out, but I also want to be able to move around comfortably and be ready in case I have to unexpectedly go somewhere that's dressy. My style basically has me prepared to go most places on short notice because there isn't always time to stop home and change.

How do you keep your casual and formal looks separate?
For nice events I try and wear a suit, but throw in my personality with the color, the lining or having it cut a little tighter than normal so you can see every movement I make. When it comes to class, there isn't the whole idea of having to wear something specific. So while I might still wear a blazer or a dress shirt, I can do more with textures and fabrics and draw attention to a specific part of what I'm wearing—like my shoes, pants or hat.

What's a go-to outfit for school?
A blazer, French-cuff shirt and jeans. I like wearing blazers because I don't carry a purse, and I hate holding things.

So no spandex then?
[Laughs.] I'm not going to wear spandex on the street; that'd be ridiculous. I'll only wear them out on Halloween as a superhero.

Favorite designers?
Versace, Ozwald Boateng and Calvin Klein.

What takes up the most space in your closet?
Shoes, belts and shades. And I'm starting to get into hats.

What draws the most comments/compliments on campus?
I get the most comments on my sneakers since they're either pink, purple or blue suede. I get the most compliments on the shirts and hoodies that I wear since they use lots of color or have some sparkle to them.

Has dance given you a new appreciation for fitted clothing?
I'd worn tighter clothes before dance, but it made me very aware of what I'd be able to wear and still move in and how much of my body can still be seen even though I'm fully clothed.

How do you incorporate your personality into what you wear to dance class?
Since everyone is moving around the entire time, it's pretty easy to get distracted. I try and tone down what I wear and almost make a uniform for myself so that I can focus more on learning the technique.

So nothing about the dance outfits drives you nuts?
The dance belt. It's basically a male thong that's a size too small on purpose. My brother did competitive ballet and aerobics, and he said, "What you've gotta do to get used to it is wear it all day one day." So I did. I'm used to it by now.

You've lived in California, New York and the Bahamas. Is the city of Boston different fashion-wise?
Fashion-wise [Boston's] career people are more conservative than most of the places I've lived. But because of all the kids in college trying to get a certain look that they've seen either on TV or from wherever, there's an overabundance of fashion that starts to look the same after a while.

Do you have any style icons?
I don't have any definitive icons. I pick up things that I like from different people but never try and imitate exactly what they do. If everyone tried to look exactly like everyone else it'd get boring quick, so I just find what I like where I can and try not to worry about what others might have done.

Favorite stores in Boston?
My favorite stores in Boston are the Tannery, Neiman Marcus and I Boutique. Every now and then I go to Bodega or Karmaloop, but their stuff is usually too baggy for me, so I'll usually just get sneakers, a tie or some accessories from them.

How long have you been into fashion?
Always. I still have my first pair of baby shoes. They're zebra skin. ✖✖✖

Ferrick That

HOMECOMING HEROINE Returning to Berklee College of Music, singer/songwriter Melissa Ferrick is the inaugural act for this year's Sovereign Bank Music Series. With honesty, humor and passion, Ferrick's emotional, first-person lyrics make a close friend out of every listener, while her instrumentation would put any Guitar Hero champ to shame. Born in Ipswich, she's an alumna not only of Berklee but also of the New England Conservatory. Her hometown show marks the launch of her new CD, Goodbye Youth, the follow-up to her acclaimed 2006 release, In the Eyes of Strangers. ELIZABETH GREENE

Melissa Ferrick performs at the Berklee Performance Center, Sept. 13, 8:15 pm. $22.50–$30 (617-744-2261) berkleeppc.com.

Better Than a Pie in the Face

Famous for its spandex-clad stunts, Cirque du Soleil returns to its performance roots with Kooza. Sure, there are still wild illusions and contortions galore, but you won't find a Beatles or Celine Dion soundtrack. Instead, Cirque showcases the art of clowning through the eyes of a child as he journeys into a dream world. High-wire and trapeze artists join jugglers and balancing acts for a French Canadian spectacle that sparkles more than the average three-ring romp. See it at the Bayside Expo center through Oct. 5—before everyone piles into a Volkswagen Beetle and heads to the next city.

Movies Edited by Nick Altschuller and Amanda Knorr

Capsules by Sean Burns

American Teen ★ This isn't the worst movie of the year, but it's certainly the most dishonest. Director Nanette Burstein ignores just about every ethical guideline dividing theatrical documentary from reality TV. Following a handful of students in a lily-white Warsaw, Ind., high school, Burstein mercilessly manipulates her footage so that these bland young kids conform to simplistic stereotypes that were already stale when John Hughes made The Breakfast Club. There's a stink of suspicion hanging over most of their emotional outbursts and tidy story arcs, so we can only wonder how many of these shenanigans were staged for the audience's benefit and how much of the teens' behavior was altered due to a noisy camera crew following them around. Entire sequences are awkwardly dubbed over with dialogue cribbed from other occasions, and keeping an eye out for costumes and settings reveals a blatantly fudged timeline. It's like an episode of the The Hills, guest starring unattractive kids. (In the suburbs.)

The Dark Knight ★★★ ½ Astoundingly ambitious, The Dark Knight is summer blockbuster as dialectical exercise. It's a philosophical debate among agents of order and chaos, punctuated with the spectacle of a depressed billionaire in flying-rodent drag beating up a psychotic clown. Preoccupied, as most of us have been for the past seven years, with how far one must go to combat an inexplicable enemy, the film wrestles with so many meaty ideas and timely concerns, you can't quite wrap your head around it all in just one viewing. As the Joker, Heath Ledger's final completed performance is the sort of roiling, balls-to-the-wall turn from which legends are made. And director Christopher Nolan ruthlessly whittles every interaction down to the barest of essentials. Yet, he cuts so quickly in and out of scenes we hardly have time to absorb vital information. The film might be too aggressive and propulsive for its own good. It's about a half-hour of breathing room away from the masterpiece it yearns to be. (At Boston Common, Fenway and in the suburbs.)

Death Race ★★ This typical, kinda crummy end-of-summer Jason Statham vehicle lacks the grisly satirical edge of Roger Corman's 1975 cult classic, Death Race 2000, and instead plays more like a cross between The Running Man and a video game. Statham stars as a tediously noble former NASCAR driver framed for murder and tossed into a maximum-security facility where inmates must vie for their freedom in souped-up dragsters armed with .50-caliber machine guns. The rules of the road follow PlayStation logic, complete with glowing manhole covers that trigger the weapons cache and handy CGI screenshots to update us on the standings and high scores. Obviously this is dumber than a bag of rocks, but the overqualified supporting cast has a grand time nonetheless. Joan Allen is a hoot as the wicked warden and goofs on her ice-queen image with giddy aplomb. Deadwood's Ian McShane tags along for the ride as a mouthy grease monkey, his eyes twinkling with delight at the desperately silly dialogue. (At Boston Common, Fenway and in the suburbs.)

Hamlet 2 ★★ ½ You've heard of a comedy of embarrassment, now get ready for a comedy of abject mortification. For whatever reason, British superstar Steve Coogan has yet to score much traction in the States, but that should change after this erratic, eventually hilarious farce. Coogan stars as a shameless high-school drama teacher who pens an ill-advised sequel to Shakespeare's masterpiece in the hopes of salvaging his school's endangered theatre program. He gets more than he bargained for once word of his production's tacky blasphemy reaches the media. (The short version: Jesus Christ borrows his dad's time machine in order to rescue all the characters that died at the end of Hamlet.) Director Andrew Fleming tends to err on the side of volume, blowing up jokes a few sizes larger than they need to be. But this weakness becomes a strength once the curtain rises on the play itself, a gaudy craptacular of such epic tastelessness that it alone is worth the price of admission. The final reel redeems a lot of early sins. (At Boston Common, Fenway and in the suburbs.)

Hellboy II: The Golden Army ★★ ½ There's no shortage of fanciful creatures in director Guillermo Del Toro's sequel to his modest 2004 adaptation of Mike Mignola's comic book. Once again following Ron Perlman's crabby, cigar-smoking demon-spawn on another mission to save humankind from the malevolent whims of the netherworld, this visually extravagant sequel is so densely packed with monsters it sometimes feels like the cantina scene from Star Wars dragged out to feature length. If only the story, by Del Toro and Mignola, were half as sophisticated as the production design. There's too much sitcom squabbling from Perlman and his flammable squeeze (Selma Blair) as a

Towelhead
★ ½
Starring Summer Bishil, Aaron Eckhart, Peter Macdissi, Toni Collette and Maria Bello. Based on the novel by Alicia Erian. Written and directed by Alan Ball. (At Harvard Square and Waltham Embassy.)

HERE WE GO AGAIN. It seems like every few years we suffer through another surge of tongue-clucking, pseudo-scandalous movies in which filmmakers feign shock at the dark secrets and twisted sexual shenanigans lurking behind the picket fences of picture-perfect suburbia. Such films tend to arrive on a wave of manufactured media attention, as critics fall in step, batting around words like "bravery" and "daring," when really this tired formula hasn't been fresh since Alfred Hitchcock made Shadow of a Doubt. Blue Velvet should have killed the genre 22 years ago, yet folks like Happiness director Todd Solondz and American Beauty

screenwriter Alan Ball are still treated as if they have something original to say.

Has there been a recent zeitgeist-defining hit that's aged as badly as American Beauty? Repeat viewings allow a bit of emotional distance from Kevin Spacey's revelatory performance, and the sour notes in Ball's smarmy screenplay become impossible to ignore. Seen today, it's a hectoring ordeal, with Ball and director Sam Mendes taking aim at caricatured fish in a barrel.

Dale Robinette

Ball is back at it with Towelhead, an empty provocation about as subtle as its title. Based on the acclaimed novel by Alicia Erian, the movie desperately wants to be transgressive, but it takes place inside a hermetically sealed bubble of smugness that's devoid of empathy for its subjects.

Summer Bishil stars as Jasira, a beleaguered half-Lebanese 13-year-old living in a Texas suburb with her estranged father, Rifat (Peter Macdissi), after mom's white-trash boyfriend tries to help shave her pubic hair. Jasira struggles with her burgeoning sexuality. She's fascinated by girly mags and masturbation, but traumatized by tampons to the point that a colleague of mine dubbed the film Are You There, Allah? It's Me Margaret.

Jasira's a blank slate, as the presumably intentional flatness of Bishil's performance invites us to project whatever feelings we wish onto the character. In contrast, Erian's novel was penned in the first-person, which allows a glimpse at an inner life woefully missing from Ball's ice-cold, omniscient perspective. Jasira exists in the film merely as a device to illuminate the cruelty and sadism of her friends, family and neighbors.

And what a loutish, venal lot they are. Rifat is a vicious martinet, torn between honoring his Lebanese heritage and pretending to be the most American guy on the block. As Gulf War I escalates in the background, he finds himself in a my-flag-is-bigger-than-yours competition with the neighbors and trashing both Saddam and Bush Sr. in equal measure. Rifat's internal conflict might have been fodder for a fascinating movie exploring the pressures of assimilation, especially during wartime, but Ball prefers to keep him simmering in the background as a cardboard villain who explodes into violence whenever the melodrama needs goosing.

Towelhead keeps fumbling these explosive signifiers and shock-value moments that Ball doesn't have a clue how to handle.

It's impossible to figure out how Jasira's mom (Maria Bello) ever ended up with this guy in the first place. Their few interactions devolve into shrill, abusive spectacles, and Bello's character is so undefined, her motivations are baffling from scene to scene.

There's also the shallow high school boyfriend who's only interested in sex and the brat across the street hurling racist slurs, but the movie rallies most of our disgust for Aaron Eckhart as Mr. Vuoso, the army reservist neighbor and proud Texan who graphically molests young Jasira.

Ball's dealing with some seriously loaded imagery, as he's essentially depicting the United States raping a Middle Eastern virgin. But despite his penchant for constantly framing Eckhart in front of an American flag, the metaphor never coalesces into anything beyond mere exploitation. Towelhead keeps fumbling these explosive signifiers and shock-value moments that Ball doesn't have a clue how to handle.

Remember how the violent climax of American Beauty hinged on a goofy case of mistaken identity straight out of an episode of Three's Company? Ball's background in hack sitcom writing reasserts itself in Towelhead, as he preposterously positions all of the principals together for a pseudo-comedic dinner party where the tension hinges on the presence of a used condom in the toilet.

I guess it earns points for audacity, but to what end? Towelhead wallows in humiliation and abuse, pointing and snickering at ill-defined straw men that exist solely to arouse our contempt. If you're going to traffic in this kind of unsettling imagery, shouldn't there be more to the film than cheap laughs?

Great filmmakers locate a common humanity and force us to identify with characters from outside our personal perspectives. Ball just asks us to feel superior to them. ✖✖✖ huge ensemble cast jockeys for screen time. Del Toro has a contagious affinity for his misfits and weirdos, and the movie's highlight finds a heartbroken Hellboy and his fishy sidekick Abe having a drunken Barry Manilow sing-along. But the stakes feel all too low, with too many jokey digressions, leading to a fatal lack of urgency in the overly bombastic, effects-laden third act. (In the suburbs.)

The House Bunny ★★ ½ Ditzy, perennial scene-stealer Anna Faris is often the best thing in some extremely bad movies. Hopefully that'll change after this cheerful lark in which Faris finally takes center stage. The ebullient bubble-brain stars as an aging Playboy Playmate banished from Hef's mansion after her 27th birthday. As we're informed, "That's 59 in Bunny Years." Faris soon finds herself nurturing a misfit sorority full of sad, nerdy girls, but the inevitable makeovers and education in men's magazine philosophies take a couple of unforeseen turns. Legally Blonde screenwriters Karen McCullah Lutz and Kirsten Smith recycle huge chunks of their previous script, as, once again, the campus bimbo proves brighter than expected. Directed with indifference by Fred Wolf, The House Bunny is carried by killer comic turns by Faris and her costar Emma Stone. The former makes wide-eyed obliviousness endearing, while Stone's snorting dorkiness is a revelation. They both deserve a better movie. (At Boston Common, Fenway and in the suburbs.)

Mamma Mia! ★ ½ I guess there's something to be said for the unabashed lack of inhibition displayed by these actors. And this slovenly adaptation of the long-running jukebox musical is nothing if not high-spirited; in fact, few major motion pictures feel so much like drunken karaoke parties. But the trouble is that stage director Phyllida Lloyd has been placed at the helm without understanding how movies work. The performances are all broader than barn doors, and the camera zigzags in every direction without ever landing in the right place. Pay no attention to the cheeky paternity plotline; it's all just a thin pretext for our stars to bellow ABBA tunes, the majority of which have no connection to what's happening onscreen. The discombobulated choreography reeks of amateur hour, and Meryl Streep gives it her all, which is frankly too much by half. Still, she fares better than costar Pierce Brosnan, whose agonized vocal bleats sound like the death throes of a freshly slaughtered yak. (At Boston Common and in the suburbs.)

Man on Wire ★★★ ½ Funny how the most exciting heist picture in ages turns out to be a documentary. Director James Marsh's artfully crafted, edge-of-your-seat adventure tells the tale of tightrope walker Philipe Petit, who one morning in 1974 danced on a high-wire between the World Trade Center's Twin Towers. Combining hyperbolically shot reenactments and stunning archival footage with the gregarious reminiscences of Petit and his band of coconspirators, Marsh lays out the elaborate break-in with the snap precision and cinematic verve of a Danny Ocean caper. All the more poignant for never once mentioning 9/11, the movie uses old photographs to let the majestic towers speak for themselves, which lends Man On Wire a shade of sorrow the filmmaker is wise enough not to push. Petit is a florid and quixotic interview subject perfectly in sync with the film's evocation of the anything-goes paradise that was New York City in the 1970s. The breathtaking climax triggers many contradictory emotions as Petit's stunt was so reckless, so foolish and so magical. (At Kendall Square and Waltham Embassy.)

Funny Bunny

Undress for Success

Anna Faris plays a dynamically ditzy ex-Playmate in director Fred Wolf's The House Bunny.

Pineapple Express ★★★ Cheech and Chong meets Tango and Cash in this zonked riff on Reagan-era buddy comedies from the Superbad writing team of Seth Rogen and Evan Goldberg. Rogen stars as a slacker process server who accidentally stumbles into a crooked-cop drug war. Seeking refuge at the pad of his gleefully addled pot dealer (a revelatory James Franco), Rogen is mistaken for a world-class hitman, which prompts all sorts of wild car chases and narrow escapes for these two gloriously inept heroes. Directed by art-house favorite David Gordon Green, Pineapple Express has a grand time goofing on 1980s action-movie iconography, even boasting a brand-new theme song by Huey Lewis and the News! The kick here is watching familiar formulas subverted because our protagonists are baked out of their skulls. Like most Judd Apatow productions, this one's a bit too willing to follow the performers along improvised tangents, but a fundamental sweetness carries the day. (At Boston Common, Fenway and in the suburbs.)

Sex and the City ★ ½ A telling early shot finds Sarah Jessica Parker and friends with their noses smushed up against the display case of a $50,000 diamond ring, thus setting the tone for the following 135 minutes of covetous consumption. With five costume changes, even the opening credits are a parade of product placements. Calling the film light on plot would be generous. Carrie and Miranda are treated shabbily by longtime loves, so they spend an entire calendar year ignoring apologies and wallowing in self-pity while Charlotte and Samantha drop by for drinks. Meanwhile, there are fashions, labels and lavish living spaces. Luxury porn and brand-name loyalty haven't been this fetishized since American Psycho. Inexplicably longer than Letters From Iwo Jima, Sex and the City leaves you feeling sorry for these shallow women and their empty, avaricious lives. (In the suburbs.)

Star Wars: The Clone Wars ★ Stinky the Hutt? Seriously? Hopefully concluding the process of diminishment that began in the '90s with "Special Editions" of the original trilogy and continued with the misbegotten prequels, George Lucas offers one final insult to anyone who grew up playing with fake light sabers. This soulless cash-grab is actually the first three episodes of an upcoming Cartoon Network series ineptly stitched together and tossed onto the big screen where the cheap animation and tinny music come off worse than even Darth George could have imagined. The garbled plot is late-model Lucas nonsense about trade route negotiations and baffling blockades. Jabba the Hutt's son Stinky is kidnapped by Sith Lords for strategic purposes, and if the flatulent baby slug isn't off-putting enough, turns out Jabba's also got a gay uncle with a Truman Capote lisp. Looks like childhood is officially over, boys and girls; we don't have to care about Star Wars anymore. (At Boston Common and in the suburbs.)

Tropic Thunder ★★★ Ben Stiller's scabrous Hollywood satire misses about as often as it hits, so it's good those hits are vicious. Sending up the absurd egomania of Tinseltown's elite, the flick follows a handful of prima donnas on an ill-fated attempt to infuse a tacky Vietnam War epic with method-acting madness. Stiller is merely adequate as a musclebound action hero seeking artistic credibility, but the character's misguided attempt to woo Academy voters by portraying a mentally challenged, buck-toothed stutterer named Simple Jack might be the best skewering of Oscar pandering ever filmed. Equally audacious is Robert Downey Jr.'s tran-

Superficial Serenade Can't make it to fashion week this year? The Boston Public Library has you covered. The BPL showcases modish movies, including Stanley Donan's classic Funny Face on Sept. 22. Before The Devil Wears Prada and Ugly Betty made fashion-mag mayhem très chic, Audrey Hepburn put her best face forward as a struggling bookshop clerk thrown into the glossy world as an amateur model. Hepburn joins Fred Astaire as they sing their way through the pressures of superficiality. Keep an eye out for Hepburns's glamorous duds; Hubert de Givenchy was the costume designer on the film. Kyle Wright scendent turn as a pompous Australian playing an African-American GI. There's no way the bit should work, but Downey is such a magician it's somehow charming. Less successful are one-note mug-a-thons from Jack Black and Tom Cruise, and the movie's wobbly structure exposes Stiller's sketch comedy roots. But whenever Tropic Thunder lands a blow, it hurts. (At Boston Common, Fenway and in the suburbs.)

Vicky Cristina Barcelona ★★ ½ Though problematic and slightly sloppy, this pleasant trifle is Woody Allen's most consistent effort since 1999's loopy La Strada remake, Sweet and Lowdown. Rebecca Hall and Scarlett Johansson star as Vicky and Cristina, American postgrads spending a summer in Spain. Enter Javier Bardem's free-spirited Latin lover and stock stereotype, who probably would be risible if played by any other actor. Bardem delivers his loosest, goofiest performance yet, embracing the role's mildewed clichés with contagious delight. Romantic entanglements and disentanglements ensue, complicated by stomach ulcers, girl-girl crushes and ill-advised rushes to the altar. The most fun comes from Bardem's ex-wife, a lusty psycho played in a movie-stealing turn by Penélope Cruz. Allen's direction is perkier and more alert than his recent work; he even moves the camera once in a while, soaking up the Barcelona scenery and gazing adoringly on his good-looking cast. Modest in both aim and accomplishment, it's hardly a return to form, but it'll do. (At Boston Common, Coolidge Corner, Kendall Square and Waltham Embassy.)

Wall-E ★★★★ Here's one for the ages. The crowning achievement from Pixar Animation Studios depicts a ruined Earth, some seven hundred years in the future, where a lonely trash compactor sorts his way through mountains of garbage, his only friend a remarkably resilient cockroach. Owing more to Charlie Chaplin than Bugs Bunny, the staggering early reels of Wall-E are devoid of any dialogue, working in a language of pure visual expression and brilliant soundscapes by Star Wars guru Ben Burtt. The lovesick travails of our adorable title character are as moving as any movie I've seen. In the second half, director Andrew Stanton switches gears into a less lyrical, more aggressively satirical mode, and introduces us to a future of overfed coach potatoes stranded in space after wrecking our planet. It's a pretty savage social commentary, but I was more interested in Wall-E and Eve, his shiny iPod-looking babe who packs a mean phaser and enlists a cuckoo's nest of malfunctioning robots to help save us all from bad programming. It's an instant classic. (At Boston Common and in the suburbs.)

JOAN HAS A RANGE

The Dambuilders veteran trades violin for voice.

Shane Van Lunteren

IF PEOPLE REMEMBER the Dambuilders, a Boston art-pop quartet from the mid-'90s, they surely recall Joan Wasser taking feisty solos on her glitter-covered violin. She's in a far different place these days as a singer-songwriter; her music's more in the melancholic vein recently mined by Feist and Cat Power.

"It was great playing violin—it never felt like there was anything missing—but one day I wanted to figure out another way to express myself musically," Wasser says. To make sure fans didn't expect solo violin gigs, she adopted the moniker Joan as Police Woman after a friend noted the then-blonde Wasser looked like Angie Dickinson from the '70s TV show Police Woman.

"Singing always scared me to death, and I don't know why because I was very comfortable onstage," Wasser says from Amsterdam on the road to a Sept. 24 show at the Middle East Upstairs. "But I have that personality where, if something really scares me, I go toward it."

Wasser has been able to find her muse in the wake of truly unsettling events. Several months after her boyfriend, the haunting singer-songwriter Jeff Buckley, drowned in 1997, she wrote songs and fronted a group for the first time with Black Beetle, featuring members of Buckley's band. And To Survive, her second album with Joan as Police Woman, is partly influenced by her mother's death from cancer.

"If you make it through those kinds of times while retaining an ability to be self-reflective, respectful and responsible," she says, "you definitely end up better on the other side."

Wasser credits singer Antony Hegarty, whose group Antony & the Johnsons she joined at the turn of the decade, as a key inspiration. "He's extremely nurturing," she says. "I felt very insecure about my songs. They're so quiet and they're so emotive. Then I met him and I was, 'Thank God, there's someone doing stuff that's coming from the same source.'"

She received further validation after launching Joan as Police Woman when Rufus Wainwright asked her both to serve as his opening act and to join his band on guitar, violin and vocals. And during a keynote interview at this year's South by Southwest conference, Lou Reed mentioned Joan as Police Woman among a handful of new artists that he enjoys.

It's quite an accomplishment for someone who stopped singing at puberty. "It made me feel too vulnerable, which is what I found later when I tried it again," says Wasser, 38, who grew up in Norwalk, Conn. Instead, she focused on the violin, which she studied at Boston University.

"I just sailed along on some talent and when I got to school, I had to catch up and practice," she says, adding that while she loved the classical repertoire, "I didn't love playing other people's music that I felt had already been captured in a fairly incredible if not perfect way."

Wasser found the Boston rock scene more her style, having grown up as a fan of punk groups like the Minutemen and X in addition to soul singers Al Green and Nina Simone. "To learn not to play off a page, that was something that was really fun and different," she says.

Although she still plays some strings, Wasser opted to let friends like fellow Johnsons violinist Maxim Moston provide the ornamental touches on To Survive while she focused on piano and guitar. And onstage, Wasser further strips down her chamber cabaret sound, aided by bassist Rainy Orteca and former Buckley/Black Beetle drummer Parker Kindred.

But where she used to pour her restless curiosity into the violin, Wasser now explores abstract depths in verse. "To America," a duet with Wainwright that closes her new CD, balances a metaphor of the United States as a mother, the idea of her mom moving to the next world, and two lonely marigolds. And in the title track, Wasser imagines her mother's voice, singing about fear: "Learn to let it in, like the rain, 'cause we never know how much we can take, before the storm breaks, the storm of our wild design."

"I'm getting to the age she was when she was singing me to sleep—it's a different perspective when you get older," Wasser says. "That's what is incredible about art: You filter it through your own experience and take what you need from it." ✖✖✖

Fiddler's Green

Erin Go Rah Flogging Molly, a seven-piece, Celtic-punk band, is still riding high from its success with Float, released earlier this year. Recorded in Ireland, it debuted at No. 4 on the Billboard 200, which is more than can be said for most Guinness-fueled pub groups who pay homage to the Pogues. Molly fans, of course, are a common breed in Boston: hard-drinking, swaggering souls whose devotion to the California band is only exceeded by their love of good beer and good craic. Join them Sept. 13 when Flogging Molly plays the Bank of America Pavilion. Elizabeth Greene

Rockie Horoscope { ROCKIE GARDINER }

WONDER WOMAN

[AUGUST 23–SEPTEMBER 22]
Brace yourself for a surprise. Despite having easier access to the finer things you may be offered while your Mercury ruler is tight with appreciative, amenable Venus, you're liable to be left in the lurch when the sun in your sign is opposed by unpredictable Uranus in your partnership zone. This is an annual astrological event, so think back to last September for a clue to what might thwart your plans. If you can't come up with an alternative, there's always the possibility that significant others are organizing a party.

LIBRA [September 23–October 22]
It can't be emphasized enough: While your desirable Venus ruler conjoins sexy Mars in your sign, the person you're attracted to, and the one attracted to you, could qualify as marriage material. Seriously, no astrological aspect indicates emotional and sexual compatibility more than the merger of the feminine and the masculine principles. Plus, in Libra, there's an inherent balance you won't find in most other signs. Mercury's conjunction with Venus on Sept. 14 should help you express your feelings about, and to, your prize.

SCORPIO [October 23–November 21]
Good news: Your Pluto coruler came of retrograde motion on Sept. 8 after five months spent reassessing and realigning your financial concerns. Better news: Your lusty Mars coruler is being embraced by loving Venus, so your advances will not be denied, not while this classic couple hook up in charming, civilized Libra. However, a friendship you've been developing could unravel when the "I did the research" Virgo sun is thrown into disarray during its opposition to wildcard Uranus and the emotional Pisces full moon.

SAGITTARIUS [November 22–December 21] Questions about where you'll be living and with whom you'll be working may come to a head during the Virgo-Pisces full moon. Since mutable signs often find it easier to adapt to the latest change than make a last-ditch stand or maintain the status quo, here's advice: Let it go. However, since fluctuating Uranus will remain in fluid Pisces for another two years, you're liable to encounter similar challenges. That is, unless Archers get really rich picking winning lottery numbers when lucky Venus and your Jupiter ruler align on Sept. 9.

CAPRICORN [December 22–January 20]
Thumbs up so far. Until Mercury turns retrograde in your Libra career house on the Sept. 24, the prognosis for September looks good. You could be enticed to test your luck this week, but nothing ventured means nothing gained. And with prosperous Jupiter in your sign, the gains are likely to be significant. There's also a good chance that the merger of macho Mars and vivacious Venus will introduce an exciting element—possibly a romance—to the conference room, classroom or community center where you're hanging out.

AQUARIUS [January 21–February 18]
The power of positive thinking: Use it. Because your rebellious Uranus ruler is a dominant force in the days leading up to the Harvest moon, check to make sure that what you're advocating won't land you in hot water. It's not just the usual authority figures who may get pissed off. While the data-driven Virgo sun opposes Uranus in your Pisces house of assets, the people signing the checks can impact your financial future. Artists, performers and humanitarians fare better than entrepreneurs and worker-bees.

PISCES [February 19–March 19]
If you don't explode when the nit-picking Virgo sun in your partnership house challenges original Uranus in your sign on Sept. 12, there's a good chance you'll get through Pisces full moon experience on the Sept. 15 with fingers and fins intact. These are challenging times for Fish, who are especially eager for the future they envision to begin. A demonstration of that faith may be called for around the 17th when you and your Neptune ruler are the recipients of Venus' affection and appreciation of artistic talent.

ARIES [March 20–April 19]
Opportunities like this don't come around very often, which is why you'd better not downplay the way you feel when your hot-blooded Mars ruler merges with loving Venus in your Libra marriage house on Sept. 11. Not only does the cycle that began around Halloween 2006 reach a conclusion, the next tour Mars takes through the zodiac should get off to a propitious start. Since what develops during the two-year circumnavigation can be shaped by what happens this week, take a moment to visualize the kind of relationship you want and with whom.

TAURUS [April 20–May 20]
While it might not be as monumental an event for you as it is for your Aries neighbor, the marriage of your Venus ruler and horny Mars can still be memorable, especially for Bulls born in May. But if a torrid romance isn't what you need right now, perhaps the rewarding connection between prosperous Jupiter and productive Saturn will be as good for your reputation as it will for Capricorn and Virgo, the other earth signs. If you're looking for divine or artistic inspiration, wait under the light of the Harvest full moon.

GEMINI [May 21–June 20]
Since your Mercury ruler has been paving the way for its retrograde session in couple-conscious Libra, pay close attention to what occurs in the weeks before the Messenger flips into reverse on Sept. 24. These are the issues that will need to be reviewed and revised during the three-week retrogression. But rather than spend time preparing for a future that may or may not happen, try to stay in the present long enough to adapt to the changes you see coming during the sun's opposition to inventive Uranus in your career zone.

CANCER [June 21–July 22]
While you and your Gemini neighbors are not on the same track, Crabs could still be vulnerable to the vagaries of changeable Uranus, especially during the days leading up to the Pisces full moon mid-month. If there's a trip or a class in the works, keep checking the arrangements and, should those plans fall through, leave time to make adjustments. The anticipated rewards of a successful partnership venture might not flow with ease because lucky Jupiter, retrograde since May, didn't face forward in your Capricorn complement until Sept. 7.

LEO [July 23–August 22]
Not every sign will come as close to the edge as yours when your sun ruler in your Virgo money house confronts disruptive Uranus. However, a cautious Lion with assets at stake might get help from Crabs and Twins who are also affected. Throw in an odd Fish and a tech-savvy Virgin and you'll have a ready-made support group searching for resources to stabilize the situation. Just don't insist on a quick fix; it may take until the Harvest full moon is on the wane before you feel reassured that the cavalry is well on its way.

Women fought for the right to take one pill a day to prevent pregnancy. HAS OUR TIME COME?

HIV-negative gay/bi men are needed to participate in a research study sponsored by Fenway Community Health. The study will test whether taking an HIV drug is safe and effective for HIV-negative men who have sex with men. If so, this method may be one of the prevention methods of the future in the prevention of HIV.

Participants will receive confidential HIV counseling and testing and $50 per visit.

Participants must be: HIV-negative | 18-years or older | Currently sexually active

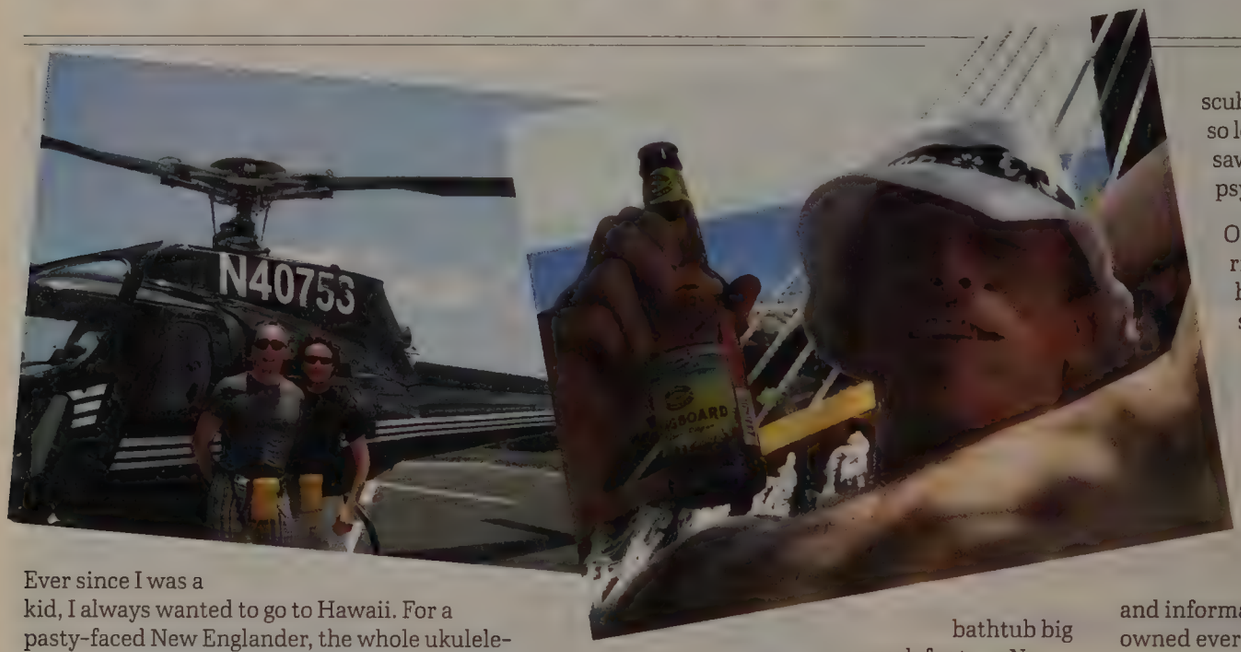
WHAT I DID ON MY SUMMER VACATION...

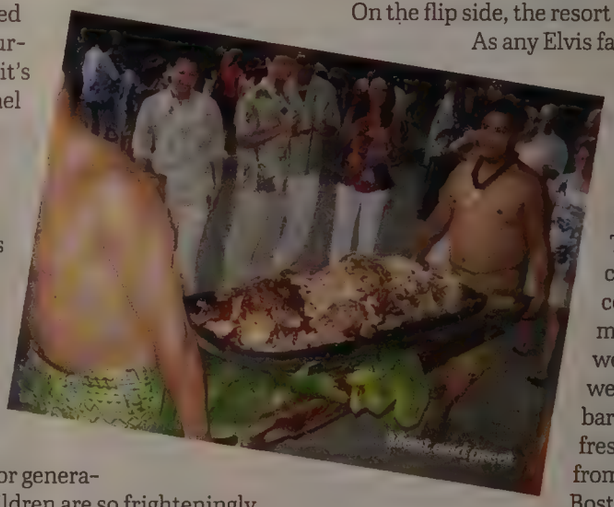


Ever since I was a kid, I always wanted to go to Hawaii. For a pasty-faced New Englander, the whole ukulele-strumming, wind-rattling-the-coconuts, nearly-naked-Polynesian thing was even more enticingly exotic than Land of the Lost, which—allow me to point out—involved a white-water rafting trip that ended up in the Cretaceous period.

Resorts aren't really my thing, though. The whole prepackaged, canned-atmosphere, forced-socialization, mandatory smiley-face aspect exhausts (and, quite frankly, revolts) me. So thank sweet Allah for Kona Village, on the Kohala coast of the Big Island. And thank Hualalai for sparing it. When the volcano blew in 1801, the lava flow split, sparing a pie-shaped slice of Hawaiian paradise that just happened to be the site of an ancient fishing village. Besides swanky digs, the property boasts a prehistoric lava field with 1,000-year-old petroglyphs (from which the resort derives its spiffy logo), and a brackish lagoon where the ancient Hawaiians used to breed live bait and store the day's catch.

Guests have their own hales—thatched-roof Hawaiian huts—and ours had a view of the ocean through some palm trees. I suppose you could call it rustic, if rustic means a hot tub on the deck, 800-thread-count sheets and a travertine bathtub big enough for two. No TVs. No phones. No AC (not that you need it, since the sea breeze and the ceiling fan are more than ample to induce snuggling under the down duvet). There aren't even any locks on the doors; a painted coconut serves as a "Do not disturb" sign.

Given how unplugged the place is, I was surprised to learn that it's co-owned by Michael Dell (as in "How do you like your computer?") and that technology plutocrats like Steve Jobs are regular visitors. Otherwise, it caters mostly to honeymooners and old-moneyed Californians, many of whom have been visiting for generations and whose children are so frighteningly polite and well-mannered that one little girl who couldn't have been more than eight approached Sam and me on our raft in the middle of the bay and said, "Excuse me. Do you mind if I join you?"



The resort's main beach is a perfect crescent of salt-and-pepper sand that's always crowded... with sea turtles, that is. So much so, in fact, that the signs warning to stay at least 20 feet away from them are literally impossible to obey. There's also a resident manta ray with a 16-foot wingspan. The two times we went scuba diving (against my doctor's advice, so let's hope he never reads this), we saw octopi, moray eels, blowfish and a psychedelic rainbow of sea life.

One afternoon, we took a helicopter ride over the volcano (Kilauea has been spewing lava into the ocean since the 1980s). It's not often that you get to watch the primordial sight of the earth being born and a somewhat more prosaic view of your S.O. puking into an airsickness bag. Another afternoon, we visited the Seahorse Museum, which—for someone who's had a lifelong obsession with the creatures—was both fascinating and informative, although appallingly I already owned every tacky thing in the gift shop.

Speaking of tacky, we attended an obligatory luau, which Sam predicted was "going to be totally cheesy." He was right. Every cliché was trucked out, and after an hour of egregiously white-washed Polynesian history, there weren't enough rum drinks in the world to make it bearable.

On the flip side, the resort has a "Paniolo" night. As any Elvis fan knows, there's a vibrant cowboy culture in Hawaii (the first ranch hands were Spaniards, which the natives bastardized into "Paniolo"). The music, dress and culture are a fascinating collision of Wild West meets South Pacific, but we had to laugh when we were informed that the barbecue options included fresh lobsters flown in from Maine. "We're from Boston," we said, being falsely altruistic. "Save them for somebody else."

Speaking of food, Kona Village (to someone in whom buffets generally provoke a combination of indecision and disgust) boasted everything from the best sashimi you've ever tasted, to lox and bagels, to croissants that would make a Frenchman weep and that you could drizzle with rare, white Hawaiian honey. In short, if there is a heaven, I won't be disappointed if it looks like Kona Village. On the other hand, when I get there, I won't be at all surprised if St. Peter's left a coconut outside the Pearly Gates. ✖✖✖

Feed Your Habit

As we chomped down on Picco's Neapolitan pizza last Friday, talk at my kitchen table turned to the dining scene. A friend dished on Barbara Lynch's expanding empire and Ana Sortun's new spot Sofra. Foodies, it seems, have an insatiable appetite for insider information.

With that in mind, we asked cover guy Todd English to write a diary. English, who owns restaurants nationwide, gladly pulled back the curtain on his life. His weeklong account is both ordinary (chauffeuring the kids) and extraordinary (scoping Vegas with a Hollywood starlet).

Keeping with the insider theme, we teamed up with chef Ken Oringer to demystify Chinatown. If the neighborhood leaves you desperate for enlightenment, fear not. Our map has everything you need to graduate from beef with broccoli.

In this issue, you'll also find kitchen disasters, seasonal recipes, favorite ingredients and other scoop from Boston's culinary royalty. We hope it gets you in the mood for fall's many flavors.

Shrimp Happens

PRAWN ARTIST

TIEN LE CAN JUDGE a shrimp. As the production manager in charge of quality control for "cold prep" at Legal Seafood's Quality Control Center in South Boston, he oversees all the lobster meat, crab legs and sauces that end up on Legal's restaurant tables from Boston to Florida. Not to mention shrimp. A good shrimp has the snap of fresh celery and the sweetness of ripe fruit, and the ones that Le handles every morning come from Vietnam. Just like Le himself.

"This is my country, not Vietnam anymore," says Le, a genial 54-year-old, quick with a laugh and a sample crustacean. After serving in the South Vietnamese army in the 1970s and being forced into an "education camp," Le escaped the communist regime as one of Vietnam's boat people (in a coincidence, he fled on the same boat as a man who works a few rooms over, cooking Legal's fabled clam chowder). He ended up on the shipping floor at Legal's QCC, where he now supervises tasks like meat extraction for 1,200 lobsters.

"A thousand pounds of raw lobster, you get 95 pounds of meat," he laughs. "You pay for the shell." Shrimp are more economical, and "their flavor is so sweet and crunchy!"

Le speaks with an immigrant's cheerful patriotism ("Everything in America is the best."), and he doesn't dream of returning to the country where he and his daily catch were born. "Time on the plane too long," he says. His passions are reserved for his adopted home—and for his shellfish. Or any fish, really. "Any kind of animal in the sea, I love them."

Drink of the Moment

A New Classic

Opening this month, the Fort Point bar Drink has been years in the making, giving master mixologist John Gertsen time to perfect his vision of the ideal watering hole: a combination of old-world charm and new-school innovation. Even for the simplest drink, there are multiple kinds of ice, including frozen Cape Pond water chunks and Kold-Draft machine cubes. "Our goal is to make this place feel like a cocktail party, and we're your hosts," Gersten says of his venture with owner and soon-to-be-upstairs-neighbor Barbara Lynch. "I'm going to make you a cocktail, and we're going to talk about it."

One conversation starter is the Fort Point. The head of the Fort Point family tree is the rye-whiskey–based Manhattan, a drink that begat the Brooklyn, which begat the Red Hook—developed by an Italian immigrant who replaced the French aperitif Amer Picon with the Italian vermouth Punt e Mes. Gertsen keeps the vermouth and adds Benedictine for a smooth, almost buttery spawn of the Manhattan. Got all that? Says Gertsen, "Everything worth doing is worth waiting for, and worth doing well." NICK ALTSCHULLER

Joanne Chang
pastry chef/owner of Flour Bakery and chef/co-owner of Myers + Chang

Question for Joanne Chang

What's your most memorable baking mishap?

My all-time biggest disaster happened at Payard Patisserie in New York City. I made a four-tier wedding cake for a VIP client—a long-time customer of the owner. It was baked in ring molds with clear plastic liners, allowing the cake to be easily removed from the rings. After my creation had been successfully delivered, and I had wiped my brow and breathed a sigh of relief, an irate bride called us from the wedding reception in hysterics. I'd forgotten to take off the liners, and now the bride and groom couldn't cut the cake. They kept pushing, trying to cut through the resistance—and the entire cake toppled. She was crying, screaming that I'd ruined not only her wedding but her whole life!

Good Eats

Get Stuffed

Ana Sortun's food has never struck us as trendy—that's part of its appeal—so when we noticed "stuffed flatbread" on Sofra's menu, we gave the chef and her newly opened cafe the benefit of the doubt. Sure enough, Sortun's version suffers no chain restaurant ills (i.e. dry, doughy wrappers and goopy fillings). Instead, she sears Lebanese saj—yeasty like pita but thin like a crepe—over a cast-iron grill bearing the same name, spoons on flavorful fillings (try the spicy, cumin- and orange-scented crumbled sausage) and folds the whole package up like a flat burrito. ELIZABETH BOMZE

ABOUT FACE

A golden tan and a dab of gloss won't cut it for fall. Now that makeup isn't melting down your face, it's time to explore the options. Embrace the cooler months with gem tones, gold shimmer and the ever-fashionable smoky eye. These three looks go perfectly with boots, sweaters and, best of all, any complexion. AMANDA KNORR

Going Out

FULL CIRCLE

Malcolm Aalders has his work cut out for him. Opening a new restaurant is always tough, but replacing an institution like Bob's Southern Bistro just adds to the stress. At the end of the month, Aalder's Circle: Plates and Lounge takes over for Bob's, which closed as owner Daryl Settles' newest venture, the Beehive, picked up steam. Still, people hated to see the jazz and soul venue supplanted, let alone by a 29-year-old Ohioan coming to town by way of the Netherlands. As Charles P. Pierce wrote in the Boston Sunday Globe Magazine, "Dear Malcolm Aalders: Go home."

Aalders is undeterred. "When the press came, I realized how special an area this really is, but the pressure of opening a place is what I've been focused on," he says. What should unruffle some feathers is his experience (he's been working in restaurants since age 15) and his unassuming Midwestern demeanor. Plus, he has musical history of his own. "My uncle ran a community big band jazz station in Cleveland," he says. "We'll play Woody Herman, Fats Waller, Miles Davis, Duke Ellington, so I'll have the opportunity to get my roots out."

Then there's the French food to attract naysayers to the 88-seat venue, mercifully free of excessive dots, loops and spheres. ("I like to keep it on the metaphoric level," Aadler explains). The chef is Adam Gendreau, formerly of Rialto, who aims to challenge the cuisine's stereotype. "Butter, cream and eggs have gone the way of the dodo," he states. Before citing influences like Alain Ducasse and Joel Robuchon, Gendreau presents sample dishes: a nage of black cod, a roasted lobster. Confident in his chef, Aadler admits, "I've never been one to like vegetables, and he's able to bring out flavors that don't bring out my gag reflex."

NICK ALTSCHULLER

STELLA ARTOIS

Perfection HAS ITS PLACE

A perfectly poured Stella Artois is the Gold Standard of Belgian beer.

Step One THE PURIFICATION

The bartender selects the signature glass for the beer being poured. The glass is scrubbed in a cool-water bath, preferably with a mild detergent. It's then rinsed with cold water to chill the glass.

Step Two THE SACRIFICE

The tap is opened in one swift motion to let the first burst of foam flow away. It must never enter the glass, thus ensuring every drop of beer is fresh.

Step Three THE LIQUID ALCHEMY

The glass is held at a 45-degree angle to create the perfect balance of liquid to foam.

Step Four THE HEAD

The head is created by straightening and lowering the glass. The foam is visually appealing and releases the beer's aroma.

Step Five THE REMOVAL

The bartender closes the tap in one quick action and moves the glass away from the faucet to ensure no drops spoil the perfect head.

Step Six THE BEHEADING

While the beer is flowing over the edge of the glass, the bartender cuts the head gently with a head cutter at a 45-degree angle. This eliminates the larger bubbles that burst easily and accelerate the dissipation of the head.

Step Seven THE JUDGMENT

The bartender now stands in judgment. The beer's head should be two fingers thick.

Step Eight THE CLEANSING

The bartender then rinses the bottom and sides of the glass. This keeps the glass clean and cool and makes it comfortable to hold.

Step Nine THE BESTOWAL

A perfectly poured pint of Belgian beer is presented with the logos of the coaster and glass facing the customer.

To experience the Nine-Step Belgian Pouring Ritual and the perfectly poured Stella Artois, please visit one of these Gold Standard Establishments:

GETTIN' FIGGY WIT' IT

Summer's over, and Jeremy Sewall, chef/owner of Lineage restaurant in Brookline, couldn't be happier. It's not because Sewall's averse to reruns or Speedos—he's just glad to see figs back in season. Taste this dish, and you will be, too. Although gourmet-sounding, the recipe is simple enough even for a novice cook (read: you). Yours probably won't taste exactly like Sewall's; he uses a wood oven to infuse a "hint of smokiness." But follow his tips, and it'll be pretty close. "Pick figs that seem heavy for their size," Sewall advises. And once they're in the oven, "cook until everything is warm and soft, but the figs should still have texture. You don't want them to get mushy."

BEN SALSKY

Black Mission Figs With Great Hill Blue Cheese
4 Servings

3 cups Black Mission figs, washed and cut in half
1 cup crumbled blue cheese; Great Hill Blue, if available
3 tablespoons honey
2 tablespoons sherry vinegar
Salt and pepper to taste

1. Warm honey and mix in vinegar. 2. Place figs, flesh side up, in a single layer in a shallow baking dish. 3. Drizzle honey mixture over them, and then the crumbled blue cheese. 4. Bake at 350 degrees for 12 to 15 minutes. Everything should be warmed through but not hot enough to completely melt the cheese. 5. Season with salt and pepper and serve.

PACK RAT

TO THE SCUMBAG who stole my kid's backpack from under our seats at the Red Sox game on Sept. 1:
We went to the bathroom and you pounced. All that was in it was his World Series sweatshirt and his beloved glove, which I've replaced already. Thanks for making me explain to my six-year-old why someone would do such a crappy thing at his favorite place in Boston on his surprise trip before starting school. And thanks to all those so-called "good citizens" who sat beside us for seven innings and "saw nothing at all." I'm a firm believer in karma, and you'll get your just desserts some day. I'll have a wry smile on my face and be wondering why!

Ted

Dear blonde pregnant woman on the Orange Line at Wellington:

I just want to say I am really, really sorry. A few weeks ago, I dashed onto the T to ensure getting a seat. I've only been commuting for a short while, and I'm not yet properly educated on T etiquette. But I know that when a pregnant woman enters the train, you're supposed to get the eff out of your seat and give it to her. Since you were the last person on, you were left standing while other riders dug their noses in their papers like your bulging belly didn't exist. I knew I should have given you my seat, but instead I sat on the edge, hoping that somehow you would know that I was offering it to you without any dialogue between us. Although I'm sure your pregnancy has brought you many wonderful things, the ability to read minds probably isn't one of them. Finally, a woman about 20 years older than I am gave you her seat, which you happily accepted. If there ever was a time I felt like I would be going to hell, that probably tops it—and this is coming from a person who called an overweight, high-school pom-pom girl "the Pillsbury Dough-leader." I just want you to know that from now on, I will always give up my seat to anyone who may need it, and, hopefully, all the other people you've been riding with these past nine months have been nicer than I was. I can only hope that one day when I'm preggo, someone will be nice to me, too.

A Not-So-Decent Citizen

Booze-cruise girl:

I met you on the last Jimmy Plunkett Booze cruise on Sept. 5. We sort of bumped into each other, and the music—along with some drinks—gave us the chance to dance the night away. But our friends broke us up before I had the chance to get your contact info. Your name was Sasha, and I believe you said you were moving to New Hampshire soon. I would love the chance to pick up where we left off. Please contact me.

Exposed zippers, studding and other rebellious details embellish some of fall's most luxurious collections, including Burberry, Balmain and Yves Saint Laurent. With a grown-up, glamorous twist, this latest crop of punk-inspired pieces are incredibly wearable. LIFE LESSONS

On creepy kids and college kicks

Six Feet Under, the Mystery

WHAT COULD BE MORE isolated, inward and frankly weird than being an undertaker? In this case, it's a woman, Clara, whose traumatized childhood makes the mortician life a safe choice. But into her psychological cave at the mortuary wanders Trecie, a little girl whose sensitive oddness resonates with Clara, raising prickles of suspicion. Trecie's peculiar choice of playground seems desperate. And Clara, having previously prepared the body of a murdered child, Precious Doe, probes the matter, gradually discovering hideous abuse and pornography. Her own sketchy mother, now dead, left Clara with a violent grandmother. Pregnant by a cruel boyfriend, Clara had given birth to a stillborn she secretly buried. From a darkly sympathetic perspective, she and Mike—a widowed cop whose own heart is broken—pursue Trecie's fate and, very subtly, each other. Though buffered by her protective employers Linus and Alma, Clara exhibits wariness and self-doubt. Those qualities make her an appealing character, as she crusades for the redemption of this other wounded girl, a kind of touching, tormented twinship.

RE-EDUCATION ONE DAY U DISTILLS THE IVY LEAGUE.

Higher Yearning

THE STIMULATING IDEA of squashing some of school's joys into one day was born when a man visited his daughter at Bard. He realized he'd rather be attending college than paying for it; hence One Day U, which brings together four professors of different disciplines from elite universities like Yale and Harvard. Each instructor gives one of his or her most popular lectures, often involving some burning question to be mulled over. On Nov. 1, for instance, political scientist Richard Pious of Barnard/Columbia asks, "Could Obama and McCain Be Great Presidents?" This month, Paul Bloom of Yale ponders: "Psychology: You Call That Art? Understanding Why We Like What We Like." In the afternoon, Elizabeth Goldberg looks at "Film and Literature in the Aftermath of Sept. 11." There's also a Q&A. Intellectual curiosity springs back to life here—without grating grades. Nostalgic former students, those considering graduate school and the simply curious come to sample higher learning.

One Day University (800-663-3298, onedayu.com, $219) has events in Wellesley and other locations.

ERBALUCE UNCORKED

Plus, bargain banh mi and a third Franklin Café

HE'S WRITTEN PLAYS, performed the occasional voice-over and waited tables at No. 9 Park. Now, almost 10 years after his inventive, authentic fare dazzled diners at the former Marcuccio's in the North End, chef Charles Draghi is finally ready for his close-up: Erbaluce, a Bay Village restaurant he's launching with his partner Joan Johnson, opens this month.

Named after an Italian white-wine grape, Erbaluce, according to Draghi, also translates into "herbs" and "light," evoking memories of his Piedmontese uncles rising before sunrise to "cut clover with a scythe, with the sun hitting the dew... and the intense, heady fragrance of lavender and thyme."

Back in Boston, in the space last occupied by Dedo, Draghi envisions Erbaluce as "a neighborhood place, the opposite of a big corporate restaurant." As he did at Marcuccio's, Draghi will visit farmers' markets daily, focus on "the primacy of the ingredient" and offer an all-Italian wine list. It will be, he says, "as if Marcuccio's has evolved."

Johnson and Draghi

BRAND SPANKING NEW, spacious and shiny, King Do Baguette and Pastry isn't just another in a series of little Vietnamese sandwich shops in Dorchester. Behind a glass wall, breadmaking machinery from Europe extends from floor to ceiling. House-baked baguettes encase the usual range of fillings—ham, pâté, pork skin or BBQ beef—plus fresh and spicy Asian vegetable salad for a mere $2.50. Hot-food counters and display cases feature everything from Chinese coconut buns to Vietnamese rice noodles stuffed with shrimp. If you're not fluent in Vietnamese, have no fear; many of the employees speak fluent English and can explain unlabeled items.

THE FRANKLIN CAFÉ, Boston's beloved late-night restaurant, is expanding its geographical reach from the South End and Cape Ann to South Boston's Dorchester Avenue. "We're hoping it'll open sometime in November," says co-owner David Dubois of the forthcoming "Franklin Southie," located on the ground floor of the Allele condo building.

A GOOD AURA

Rachel Klein shows her talents at the Seaport Hotel.

I HAVE A COLLEAGUE WHO lives in Cambridge. Not surprisingly, considering his address, he has some very strong opinions. When I mentioned Aura, the Seaport Hotel's restaurant now under the talented stewardship of Rachel Klein (formerly Om's chef), he dismissed hotel restaurants as ordinary at best and unworthy of his patronage. The poor fellow has consigned himself to gastronomic deprivation. Some of the best dining in Boston is done in such spots: Meritage in the Boston Harbor, Great Bay in the Commonwealth, Clio at the Eliot, Mooo at XV Beacon and more. No doubt Klein aspires to have Aura join this distinguished company, and my recent visits suggest that she's on the right track.

Aura's twin connected dining rooms have the look and feel of an upscale Parisian venue, their well-spaced tables set with crisp white napery, elegant tableware, gleaming crystal, fresh flowers and soft lighting augmented by an opening in the ceiling. Also tasteful, the wine list seemed well chosen, albeit expensive. It offered a first-rate 2003 Chateau Lyonnat ($40) from St. Emilion-Lussac, dry with a minerality showing its distinctive Bordeaux terroir, as well as a big, juicy 2006 Michael Pozzan Cabernet Sauvignon ($10 a glass) from Napa and a robust Luigi Bosca Malbec Reserva from Argentina ($10 a glass). Fresh, crusty bread came with a generous scoop of roasted garlic/white bean puree and soft butter.

The fall menu, launched soon after Labor Day, pushed the creative envelope, beginning with a wild mushroom appetizer ($15) that featured assorted fungi, including large slices of cream-colored king oyster, all bathed in a red wine sauce. Just as original, the eggs en cocotte ($15) combined chunks of lobster, corn, Boursin cheese and leeks with an egg carefully poached to make the yolk firm but not hard. The eggs arrived in a small, white-porcelain–covered ramekin. The star of the starters, short rib pappardelle ($16) had wide noodles made in house and cooked to perfect, al dente texture, then dressed with a robust, meaty beef sauce spiced with cinnamon, enriched with olives and truffle oil, subtly sweetened with plum and topped with a thin shaving of grana padana cheese. A generous mountain of pasta, the pappardelle made a serious dent in our appetites.

Main courses ran the gamut from chicken to seafood to lamb to beef. Best was the Gianone chicken ($28), half a succulent Canadian bird enveloped in crisp-roasted, pleasantly salty skin. Garnishes of broccoli rabe, morsels of Chinese sausage and a superb wild mushroom vol-au-vent with luscious, dark bay-cream sauce made this an extraordinary dish. Georges Bank scallops ($28) brought three large, sweet, velvety sea scallops, a slice of giant oyster mushroom, small baby zucchinis, yellow summer squash and very tasty cauliflower puree. In contrast to the pleasant saltiness of the chicken skin, however, this dish's borderline saltiness risked obscuring the delicious flavor of the ingredients. Meanwhile, firm-fleshed wild striped bass ($32) was presented on concentric pools of piquant horseradish remoulade and potato puree, with grilled green onions on top. Four plump fried oysters, the delicate but distinctive flavor of their liquid intact, offered a delightful garnish.

Lamb loin ($34) arrived under a jungle of dandelion greens dressed with apricot-ginger vinaigrette and pine nuts. The meat seemed sparse but delicious, with Klein's signature fusion-flair making good use of Asian spices to add depth and complexity. And I would have happily traded most of the mushy-textured miso eggplant garnish for another morsel or two of lamb. Finally, Aura offered a small "steak house" menu that did a credible job of satisfying the meat-and-potatoes business constituency—and of competing with the Morton's next door. Aura's Painted Hills Farm sirloin ($42) yielded a thick, well-seared slab of tender beef, perfectly grilled to medium-rare temperature and juicy texture. Sauces included béarnaise, bordelaise, porcini cream and others, but the sirloin's beef flavor needed no boost.

Roasted coffee parfait

We tried two desserts: cherry tart and roasted coffee parfait ($9). The tart tended toward the sweet side, but the flaky pastry and bright-red hibiscus syrup made the dish interesting. The parfait, with its rich coffee flavor, creamy texture and aromatic sauce spiked with orange-flower essence, won my heart. I ordered it twice. While Aura might be able to survive on hotel guests and visitors to the Seaport's concert and artistic venues, it's evident that Klein hopes to make it a destination restaurant, drawing people from both city and suburban neighborhoods. Her continued efforts to produce dishes that showcase her culinary know-how and versatility deserve such a wide audience. ×××

IN YOUR FACEBOOK

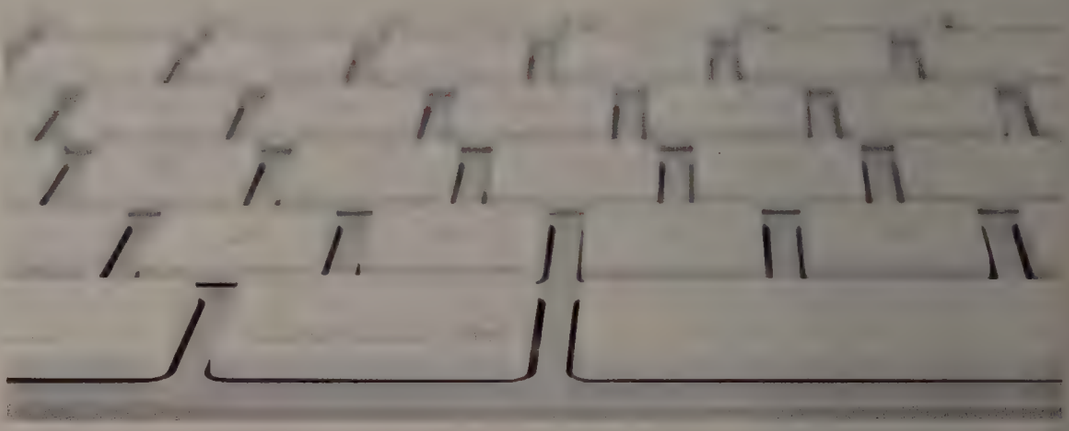
Go ahead and poke me.

I FIRST HEARD ABOUT Facebook a few years ago, when a buddy in grad school (and thus possessing a coveted ".edu" e-mail address) told me that there was this new social networking site that made it really easy to check out hot undergrads. It was called Facebook, and it was only open to college students. I briefly considered enrolling for a Ph.D. at Harvard before I realized that Facebook sounded a lot like MySpace, which was kind of like Friendster but sort of different from LinkedIn. So when Facebook opened to the general public, I decided I'd just sit this one out and skip straight from MySpace to the post-Facebook networking craze, whatever that might be. I'd be the first one on the boat, and then I'd tell all my friends about it and mockingly say, "Oh, you're still on Facebook? I've been on SocialSphere for a few weeks now, and I've already moved from Pal status to Level 2 Chum with 58 percent of my Kevin Bacons. What? You don't know what a Kevin Bacon Level 2 Chum is on SocialSphere? Oh, I'll have my grandmother explain it to you."

My absence on Facebook is due to the same trait that's prevented me from checking my account on MySpace in about a year: I'm lazy, and I like to procrastinate. I really don't need yet another vehicle for electronic note-passing in the back of the classroom. I foresaw myself stalling on overdue assignments by writing on people's walls. (Which, if you're not on Facebook, is like e-mailing, except... um... Well, it's exactly like e-mailing, except that other people can see it, too. It's crazy.) I'd poke people and search for friends and update my status by the minute. In two months, I'd be destitute, unemployed and selling my body to support my paint-thinner addiction. So no Facebook for me.

But eventually, it became more annoying not to be on Facebook than to just give in and sign up. Every time friends got together, they'd talk about it, using the arcane verbiage of the insiders—boasting about who had the most vampire points and how many chumps they'd infected—and I'd be made to feel as culturally illiterate as someone who doesn't watch Gossip Girl. So I signed up.

I want vampire points!



Every time friends got together, they'd talk about it, using the arcane verbiage of the insiders.

Initial impression: I'm still not entirely sure why this is so much different than MySpace. I know you need to be friends with someone to see their profile, but it seems like you could pretty quickly accrue a massive level of "friends," whom you might never have met, just like on MySpace. My buddy Scott, for instance, has 117 friends on Facebook. I'm quite sure Scott doesn't have 117 friends in the real world, as evidenced by the fact that he was the first one to write on my wall, and what he posted was, "Dude, you are SUCH a douche."

I replied, "Did you really need to call me a douche on my wall? I mean, you could've e-mailed or texted me that sentiment if you wanted to quickly apprise me of your opinion re:my douchery. I just don't see Facebook as the best way to accomplish that. By the way, good to see your mom's on Facebook—Butterfacebook." Then I realized that, for all I know, Scott's mom actually is on Facebook, so I added, "Obviously I'm just joking, and I mean no disrespect to anyone in your family."

After sending out about 20 friend requests and filling out a corresponding number of captchas ("Does that say 'Ape bonanza' or 'Apt bananas'? Damn."), it was time to set my photo. This is the most important decision to be made on social sites, because you want to look cool but don't want to look like you care if you look cool. Ideally my picture would be casual, but I'd somehow come off looking really hot and completely unconcerned with my coolness. After several hours of digging, I finally found the perfect photo, but it seemed a little dated given my Vuarnet of France sunglasses, "Just Do It" T-shirt and the fact that I was 5'5" because it was eighth grade. So I settled on a shot from last week, where I'm exiting a rural outhouse with giant holes in its walls. I'm not sure what that says about me, but I look awesome, which is the main thing.

I'm still just scratching the Facebook surface. I don't know how to tag people's photos or grow gardens, or why you'd do either of those things. But I look forward to spending a lot of time finding out, so if you want to give me a poke, go right ahead. And if a grizzled homeless dude who looks a lot like me asks you for change in about two months, at least offer him some vampire points. ✖✖✖

ACCIDENT ASSURANCE

For a true klutz, there's a mishap at every turn.

MY KIDS COINED ME Inspector Clouseau. I'm always bumping into things—my thighs, shoulders, arms often blue-black with contusions. They call it "never paying attention." I call it "lost in ideas." I never thought of myself in those terms until my first visit to Europe after college graduation. I was traveling on a shoestring budget with two fancy friends who dragged me along.

Our first stop was London. One of my buddies had met a London debutante back home that spring. She was vaguely royal and sported a hyphenated name: Margaret Gordon-Buck. Bobby rang her upon our arrival, and she invited us to a garden party. Lubricated enough to feel daring, off we went in a cab. Bobby carried a snap-top Zippo lighter. It was a time when everyone smoked. He had this trick of flipping the Zippo open on his thigh, then flicking it upward on the same leg to light it.

Margaret Gordon-Buck welcomed us with kisses on both cheeks and enthusiasm for everything, including my wash-and-wear suit. I wasn't so sure. The other guests, gathered around a small frog pond, were dressed to the nines. Gin and tonics flowed, along with a few Pimm's cups. Across the pond, I saw the girl of my dreams.

I knew exactly the suave, perfect thing to do. I flicked the Zippo open on my thigh and leapt across the frog pond, planning to have the flame on the end of her cigarette in an instant. She couldn't resist me. Until I slipped on the stone edge and fell ass over teakettle, the Zippo headed for the murky bottom. My imagined new love pulled her hat to the side and went off with someone who looked like a wing commander. The hostess was solicitous, saying, "At least you'll dry off quickly." Out of the closet as a klutz.

The gawky gene kept kicking in, enough times that my three kids found it somewhat endearing. One spring break, we went on a trip to the Caribbean, staying at a small hotel that demanded jackets and ties for dinner. Every hair dryer in the place was going full blast at 6 pm. From our bathroom, I heard a bloodcurdling scream. Ordinarily, I'd be worried, but the decibel level indicated the family "bug cry."

I hung on while the Vespa hit three cars and collapsed in a traffic jam.

My wife is terrified of bugs, and I've heard this yelp many times. I ran into the bathroom and saw her pointing at the overhead light fixture.

"The biggest bug," she insisted, "just crawled in there. Do something." I shooed her out, brave in the face of danger. Standing on the toilet, I could see something in the globe light. But it was hot to the touch, and I couldn't reach in. "Is it dead yet?" my wife yelled from beyond the door.

"Almost," I said. Frantic, I grabbed a container of Right Guard and sprayed it into the globe—which subsequently exploded in fragments. Then there was a long bzzzzzz sound, followed by every light in the hotel shutting down and every hair dryer stopping midblow. Later, when the family met for dinner, my boys said, "When the lights blew, we looked at each other and said, 'Dad?!'" Klutz.

Last proof of clumsiness: I was in Rome, some years ago, again traveling with friends. We decided to rent Vespas to tool around the city. My companions had some experience. "It's a breeze," they assured me. "Your mother could get the hang of it."

"You don't know my mother," I replied. But on we went. I had a lesson, clinging to the back of a rental agent while he drove me to the Piazza Navona.

"You dig?" he said in an Italian accent.

"I think I dig. Gas on the left hand, clutch on the right hand."

"Seemple, si?" he said.

"Si," I said, rehearsing my moves.

I was dressed like Daddy Cool Breeze: black chinos, engineer boots, red bandana tied at the neck. My friends buzzed around me on their scooters, instant pros. "Andiamo!" they yelled. I hopped aboard the Vespa and began revving the motor, my right hand holding the clutch down. Vroom... vroom... went the little darlin'.

"Hey," yelled the rental guy, and I turned, raising my arm in what seemed, to me, an Italian gesture. But I had released the clutch, and the bike jumped out like it was shot from a Beretta. I hung on while the Vespa hit three cars and collapsed in the midst of the traffic jam it had caused. My buddies collapsed as well, in hysterics. Klutz.

But Klutzville never fades. Two days ago, thoughts swirling in my mind, I headed for the revolving door in my office lobby. Distracted, I leaned into the revolving part. But it was fixed glass, and I re-broke a nose that already left a lot to be desired. How do I put a positive spin on this? Klutz. ✖✖✖

You're just not that good. You aren't even a real center. Chief's gonna have you for dinner!' Even though Chief did kick my butt on many occasions (laughs)."

HOF Diaper Dandy Dick Vitale on Celtics rookies JR Giddens and Bill Walker: "You know Walker's coming off a bunch of injuries, so that's going to be a real test. Can he hang with the pace of the NBA game? But he's talented. Giddens is another guy. World of talent, but he's been a little up and down. Had a few little issues, but can he play? He's got ability."

Hakeem Olajuwon, on stage in front of a couple thousand people: "I'd like to introduce you all to wife!" (Spotlight on wife, who walks up to the stage and takes the mike from the Dream.) "[…silence…more silence…awkward silence…]" (Hands mike back and walks offstage.) And, scene.

5 OVER/UNDER BETS

Patriots' Wins: Over/Under 10.5
Now that Matt Cassel's proven he's got what it takes to win (or "not lose") a big game, we can chill out and remember the JV schedule that lies ahead—especially since our supposed two toughest opponents (Indianapolis and San Diego) are in rougher shape than the Pats. Who knows how the postseason will play out, but for now we'll take 11 wins.
Pick: Over

Red Sox Playoff Wins: O/U 10
If the Sox win 11, they win the World Series, but right now, we just aren't feeling a repeat. The 1-2-3 pitching combo is the best they've had in 20 years (at least), but will there be enough pop in the lineup to complement the arms? Plus, how confident can you be in a team that loses one-run games like they're a crappy pair of sunglasses?
Pick: Under

Laurence Maroney Season Rushing Yards: O/U 800
Unless you count all of Herschel Walker's personalities, the Patriots definitely have the deepest five-man running-back unit in recent NFL history. Sure, we'd hoped that the Kool-Aid Man would have a backfield of his own at this stage in the game, but as long as Lil' Faulk keeps getting money, Evans keeps busting heads, and Jordan and Morris keep eating up first downs, you really can't complain.
Pick: Under

David Ortiz ALDS Homers: O/U 2.5
Like A-Rod in April, Big Papi thrives in October. But will injuries and lack of protection hold him back? We're not betting on it. Assuming the series goes four or five games, Papi will hit three long balls. Tek will have at least three, too—not homers, though. Groundballs to shortstop.
Pick: Over

Soxtober References on NESN: O/U Infinity
Orsillo: Hey Remdawg! Looking forward to Soxtober? Remy: Soxtober? Yeah, Soxtober! Ooooh, Soxtober… Love Soxtober! I even love saying Soxtober! Actually, I wanna scream it… Soxtooooooooober!! Me too! Let's just keep saying it. Okay, go!… SOXTOBER!!!!
Pick: Over

1 ONE COMMENT ON THE PITCH ZONE

In all our years of watching ESPN Sunday Night Baseball, we've maybe seen the K-Zone wrong once—and that was only because Joe Morgan talked it into sleep mode—but doesn't it seem like NESN's Amica Pitch Zone is off on about every other pitch? Does Amica have…Pitch Zone Questek?

4 DATES TO WATCH

9/28 It's the Sox' last game of the regular season, and the little Yankees get to play spoiler…. Isn't that cute! Look at them out there fighting so hard for a moral victory!

9/30 The Celtics kick off Training Camp in Newport, R.I. Hey, it's not Rome, but Newport's got history! Instead of touring the Coliseum, the team can visit the yacht club where two 35-year-old investment bankers fought to the death over whose popped collar looked sweeter.

10/1 The MLB playoffs are under way, and so is the yearly barrage of flaming poo bags on Tim McCarver's doorstep. But Timmy won't notice. He'll be too busy practicing 100 different ways to butcher the name Akinori Iwamura.

10/5 The Pats should dominate in San Francisco this afternoon, but things won't get testy until the final seconds, when Niners QB JT O'Sullivan mysteriously disappears from the field without saying good-bye.

2 LIKELY FIRST-ROUND FOES (IN POETRY FORM)

Chicago White Sox
Ozzie Guillen loves Pedroia
It's almost a little bit sick
Our catcher is our captain, theirs is just a dick
If good pitching beats good hitting
Then Boston will be cool
As long as cops keep Orlando Cabrera
Away from the Boston Latin School

L.A. Angels of Anaheim
We've owned them in the past
But this season they've owned we
Their closer wears his rec-specs
Ours kicks it like Swayze
Without home field advantage
It won't be easy to defend
But the Curse of Donnie Moore will Burn the Angels in the end

"If there's a genre of plays that I just don't get, it's the Greeks."

Soroff On PETER DUBOIS

The Huntington Theatre's artistic director sounds off on critics, Macbeth and gay Alaska.

LAST JULY, PETER DUBOIS became the artistic director of the Huntington Theatre Company. Now 38, DuBois cut his teeth in the Czech Republic, where he cofounded Asylum, a multinational "squat" theater in Prague. DuBois was artistic director of the Perseverance Theater in Juneau, Alaska, and for the past five years served as resident director of New York's famed Public Theater, where he directed Jack Goes Boating and A View From 151st St. This winter, he'll direct the New York premiere of Becky Shaw at Second Stage Theatre. Other credits include a revival of Sam Shepard's Curse of the Starving Class at A.C.T. in San Francisco, as well as productions at Actors Theatre of Louisville, Providence's Trinity Repertory and California Shakespeare Theater. Among his many awards and accolades are several New York Times' Critics Picks and two Rockefeller M.A.P. grants. He lives in Boston with his partner, Ben Bohen.

Jonathan Soroff: What enticed you to come to Boston?
Peter DuBois: The theater spaces are really beautiful houses. I was talking to a friend, and he said, "If you like the spaces, take the job." I also like this city. There's a high level of intellectual capital here.

What's the biggest difference from New York?
New York is the capital of the world in terms of theater because Broadway is there.

What about London's West End?
Yeah. I'd say the three are the West End, New York and Toronto. New York's just the biggest in terms of activity, although there are arguments to be made about who's turning out the best stuff. But the great thing about Boston is the intimacy you have with the community.

Can we look forward to more full-frontal nudity under your directorship?
Yes, as a matter of fact. We're busting some of that out in the coming season.

Ever consider reviving Oh, Calcutta!?
[Laughs.] I am working on a Mikado set in an Edwardian whorehouse.

How was it being openly gay in Alaska?
There's a huge lesbian community. Not a lot of gay men. And the lesbian community was really pretty closeted. It was the first place I've been where they really needed a Gay Pride Day. There was a gay bar in Anchorage that—well into the '80s—you had to stand away from the door because people would shoot through it. It was insane. Having said that, there's a really big libertarian, live-and-let-live streak, but the crazy born-again evangelical Christians all came from Oklahoma and Texas, so there's this group there that don't really want to let people live. That's why I'm happy to be here. Boston is such a great gay city.

Where are the winters worse: here or Alaska?
Alaska because of the rain. We had double the rainfall of Seattle, and the wind would blow 60 miles an hour sideways. It was nasty.

Pet peeve in the theater?
Theaters that don't have good social spaces. A theater might be a place to go watch a play, but the experience begins the minute you park your car. You should always be able to get a good drink or a bite to eat. There should be comfortable places to sit. So one of our goals is to do something with our lobby.

Favorite playwright, living or dead?
I'll name three. Oscar Wilde, Tony Kushner and David Grimm.

Favorite actor?
Philip Seymour Hoffman.

Worst play you've ever seen?
Woyczek. It's an unfinished play by Büchner and it's considered a classic. It's just a play that I've never been able to hook into. And if there's a genre of plays that I just don't get, it's the Greeks.

Shakespeare, Marlowe or Jonson?
Shakespeare. He's messier. Marlowe's more mathematic.

Don't you hate those people who leave before curtain call?
I can't stand that. I can't believe it. It shocks me. It's startlingly rude. It's just to get to their car quicker, and I'm willing to bet they're saving maybe 10 minutes. I think it would be more polite to push people out of your way in the parking garage. It's just staggering.

Your take on critics?
When the critic is good, I feel like I'm having a conversation. When a critic is bad, I feel like there's a tastemaker who doesn't know anything about taste.

Most memorable night in the theater?
Probably the opening of Kushner's Caroline, or Change at the Public Theater, because it was the first show that I was there for as associate producer. The other one I'd say is being a 20-year-old queer kid sitting in the fourth row at Angels in America. I was with a friend, and I came out to her after the show that night. I remember every moment and detail of that production.

Any actors you'd never work with again?
I've had actors who've done things like come to my hotel room really drunk to give me notes on the play, which can be kind of terrifically insane. But there's no one I've encountered who burnt any bridges with me.

Biggest onstage disaster?
[Laughs.] Probably the night that Daphne Rubin-Vega walked into a wall backstage and came back on with a bump the size of an egg. But an even bigger one was when I was doing A Winter's Tale, and the technical director decided to use a driveway sealer to seal the set. We had to postpone the show by like four days because the stuff was so toxic.

Are all actors annoying?
Only if you try to date them. Don't date an actor.

Most overrated play?
I'm torn between As You Like It and Macbeth. I think Macbeth lacks nuance. It just hits you over the head. It's primary colors. I never feel anything after a production of Macbeth.

Hardest thing to make look real or believable on stage?
Hair. A good wigmaker is worth their weight in gold. ✖✖✖

Diary of a Celebrity Chef

A week of child-rearing, cooking and restaurant hopping

By Todd English

Illustrations by Antony Hare

UNLESS YOU'VE BEEN living on a diet of dog food and multivitamins, you know Todd English. It's hard to overstate his titanic status in the restaurant world. He's a cross between Julia Child and Julius Caesar—a virtuoso with a skillet commanding an empire of restaurants stretching from New York to New Orleans to the deck of the Queen Mary 2 to his flagship Olives in Charlestown. This is a man who can casually open a restaurant in Los Angeles with Eva Longoria Parker, or knock off a PBS series without breaking a kitchen sweat. And we haven't even mentioned his vanilla-bean soufflé.

For the week of his 48th birthday, English kept a diary of his imperial and culinary exploits for The Improper—a glimpse into the highest stratum of the celebrity chef's life. He splits his time between Beacon Hill and Manhattan, between hanging out with his kids Simon, Isabelle and Oliver and hatching up new ways to, say, roast branzini. Not to mention getting ready for his wedding to fiancée Erica Wang. It's an exciting time to be Todd English. But he can tell you that for himself.

Sat., Aug. 23

I'm in the Hamptons today cooking a benefit dinner that was auctioned off at a Big Brothers Big Sisters event earlier this year for $10,000. I'm working in the private home of the bidder and 12 friends, making a six-course meal with items that I bought at the farmers' market. One of the courses will be a tomato tasting, including a savory tomato gelato. There's also a marriage of tuna sashimi and ceviche inspired by my recent trip to Peru and a "gnudi gnocchi" with local vegetables, such as native corn and wild mushrooms.

Sun., Aug. 24

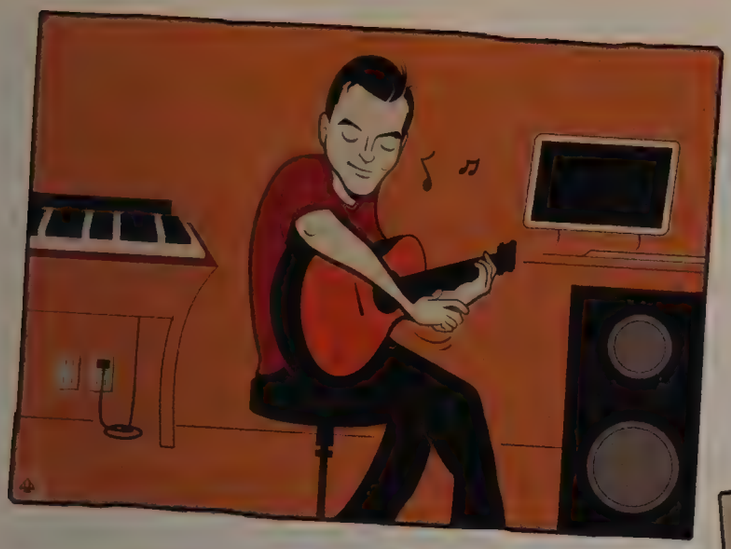
Today, I was at Cornell dropping off my oldest son Oliver for his freshman year of college. Oliver wants to follow in my footsteps in the restaurant industry, and they have the best hospitality program in the country. I'm really excited for him, and it was a lot of fun setting up his dorm room, meeting his roommate and parents, and walking around the campus. There was a buzz of people. Oliver already knew his roommate, who is from Boston, and they chatted all summer on Facebook. Driving away was sad. It hasn't totally sunk in yet, but I know it's going to hit me.

Mon., Aug. 25

I started my morning off attending my daughter Isabelle's school orientation at Beaver Country Day. Another child, another day, another milestone. My next stop was in Hingham at Kerry Brett's studio, where I got groomed and photographed for this issue. After the shoot, I picked up Isabelle from soccer practice and my youngest son Simon, and headed over to Olives Charlestown to talk with executive chef Joe Brenner about the fall menu and to finish taking a few more photos at the restaurant with Kerry. We discussed bringing back some of Olives' classics—a lot of pumpkin stuff that our customers love, like the pumpkin lasagna. Then, Simon, Isabelle and I went home, I made them dinner, and we watched TV. On the menu tonight was sesame-crusted tuna, stir-fry vegetables and brown rice.

Tue., Aug. 26

Simon and I had a golf lesson in the morning, and then we each hit a bucket of balls—male bonding with my youngest son since my oldest is off to college. Now it's really starting to set in that Oliver isn't here anymore. After golf, I dropped off Simon and went to Kingfish Hall to check in and do some menu development. Our executive chef, Katherine See, just had a baby this weekend, so I'm working with the sous chef on the fall menu. One of the really exciting items is going to be a whole-roasted branzini fish. Next, I hopped on a plane to New York City and went to check out the Libertine, our latest NYC establishment, which opens Sept. 8. The inside looks great; I wanted it to be a British gastro-pub with the feel of an old gentleman's club—lots of rich mahogany, leather and art-deco twists. The Libertine's executive chef Eben Leonard has come up with some cool creations, like the adult PB&J—almond butter, cabernet red-wine jelly, whole-grain bread and a banana milk shake. Tonight, we did a Scotch tasting, since spirits are going to be a big part of this place.



Wed., Aug. 27

I had a couple meetings in Manhattan today at Olives N.Y. The first meeting was about the continuation of my PBS TV show, Food Trip. I talked to the producers about filming in Italy and locations to check out. And I worked on my new book—full of recipes and stories from my travels around the globe—set to release next year. We took some great photos of food that'll be featured. I also met with Jeffrey Beers who's designing a new restaurant I'm working on in New York that's going to open late 2009. And I met with Olives N.Y. executive chef Mike Crain about a corporate function we're having next week, and we planned the menu for it. We got in the kitchen and created a couple new items, including a sirloin bruschetta with Roquefort cream and a squash macaroni and cheese, which may make it as fall specials.

Thu., Aug 28

I worked out with a trainer this morning and then took a guitar lesson. I've gotten back into playing recently, and I absolutely love it. I studied classic guitar when I was younger, but this is all rock. Today, I learned to play the acoustic version of "Everlong" by the Foo Fighters. I spent the rest of the day at the Libertine with Eben. We were training staff, fine-tuning recipes and prepping for tonight. I invited a few friends and family to come in for a menu tasting and also to start my birthday celebration. My birthday is tomorrow, but I thought we'd kick the weekend off with this dinner. We served smoked salmon pot pies, crab cakes, caviar sliders with quail eggs and crème fraîche, a local and U.K. artisan cheese plate, and a sampling of desserts, including blueberry pie with corn ice cream and a vanilla soufflé with stout ice cream. What a night and what a meal!

Fri., Aug. 29

Today is my birthday. To celebrate, I jumped on the plane with Sam Hazen from my team, and we went to Vegas for work and fun. Sam helps with new concept development and strategy. We met with actress Eva Longoria Parker and the rest of our Beso crew to look at a few potential spaces for a new Beso in Las Vegas. I checked in with Olives Las Vegas, and Sam and I worked with the chef on some menu additions, including sweet-potato soup and a new take on veal osso buco. Then we went to the opening of Rok Vegas, which is one of my Beso partner's new clubs. It was an amazing time. Katy Perry, who sings "I Kissed a Girl," was there. We had a ball. It was a quick trip but definitely worth it.

Sat., Aug. 30

I had to hop on an early-morning flight to get to Tampa, Fla., for an HSN weekend. I got in at 5 pm, and the staff had a little birthday party for me and gave me a card with Brian, the dog from Family Guy, on it that said, "Who do I have to hump to get a martini around here?" I thought it was hilarious; I love that show. I went on air to sell my kitchen/lifestyle line at midnight. Needless to say, I was exhausted, but it was worth it. They told me the Todd English GreenPan line is one of their best sellers, and I love doing it. I got off air and went right to bed, because I have to go back on again at 3 pm on Sunday. Just another week in my busy life. ✖✖✖

Insider's Guide to Chinatown

BY Elizabeth Bomze

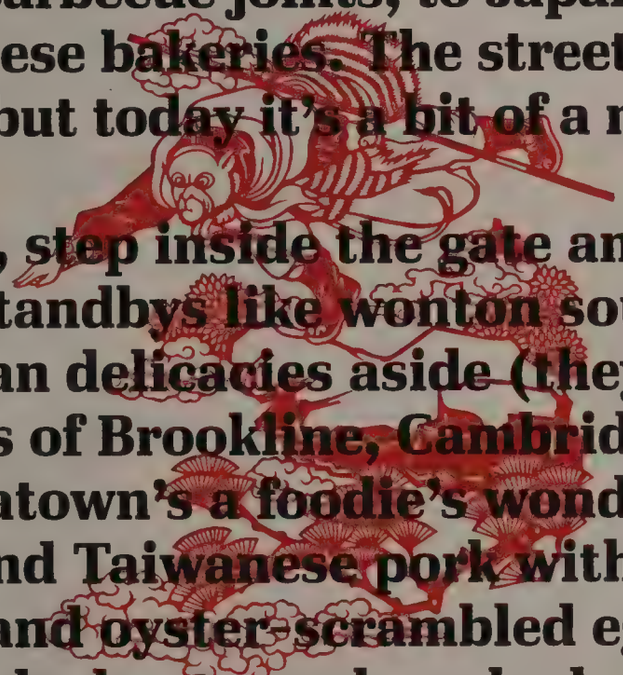
STANDING BEFORE THE CHINATOWN GATE, the beef-with-broccoli loyalist might feel a bit like Alice stumbling upon Wonderland: utterly overwhelmed by the stretch of seemingly identical doors and exotically foreign foodstuffs. The journey that begins on Beach Street—this neighborhood's main drag—quickly becomes more than a trip to an all-you-can-eat fried-rice buffet. In recent decades, the menu has morphed into a pan-Asian feast with a motley crew of guests, from grand Cantonese dim sum halls, to Hong Kong–style barbecue joints, to Japanese shabu-shabu houses to Vietnamese bakeries. The street signs may still say "Chinatown," but today it's a bit of a misnomer.



With that in mind, step inside the gate and bid farewell to Americanized standbys like wonton soup and chicken chow mein. Sichuan delicacies aside (they're strangely isolated to corners of Brookline, Cambridge, Malden and Somerville), Chinatown's a foodie's wonderland. Pick a door. You might find Taiwanese pork with bamboo tips, braised pigs' feet and oyster-scrambled eggs; open another and see tightly packed patrons hunched over steaming bowls of Vietnamese pho, their chopsticks tangled in nests of rice sticks and rare rib eye. Oh, and about those chopsticks: They're the default. Forks come by request only. Be discouraged.

To get you going, we teamed up with chef Ken Oringer (a self-professed Chinatown addict) and put together a map—a collective cheat sheet—of our most-craved meals and shopping spots. Beyond that, just follow the crowds and be sure to sample along the way.

Never mind the sweets and head for the sandwiches. For a handful of laundry change, you'll get a demi-baguette filled with slabs of Vietnamese bologna and terrine-like cheese or plush tofu. But it's the authentic fixings—fiery Thai chiles (extra spicy, please), creamy pâté and tasty vegetables—that make this a worthy meal.

2. Bakery

Hing Shing Pastry

Bostonians know Boston cream pies but not fried bean-buns. No gooey custard and chocolate varnish here. These puffy, sesame-seeded spheres contain addictively sticky, sweet black-bean paste. Meanwhile, savvy dessert devotees tout the egg-custard tarts—their jiggly fillings encased in a flaky shell—and ornate moon pies as the best around.

3. Cantonese Seafood

East Ocean City, 25-29 Beach St., Boston, 617-542-2504

"Are these acceptable?" the waiter asked on a recent visit, offering up a tub of live spot prawns from the holding tank. A house specialty, these seasonal, sweet shrimp are served head-on (for sucking out the briny, tomalley-like innards). Also on the seafood shortlist: hard-to-find barramundi, Dungeness crabs and possibly the plumpest, wok-charred baby clams ever to be sauced with black beans.

Finally: one-stop shopping for 28-inch woks, firecrackers and orthopedic footwear! No, it's not Wal-Mart, but the bargain-basement prices and oversized bags make it easy to stock up on Japanese teacups and sharp, cheap knives. To Chuck Williams, his Sonoma-based storefront and its All-Clad collection: Where do you shelve the scorpion bowls and paper lanterns, again?

5. Dim Sum

Winsor Dim Sum Café
10 Tyler St., Boston
617-338-1688

Shumai purses and rolled rice noodles gently release their steam on the merry-go-round of pushcarts at Chau Chow City and Hei La Moon. For fried eggplant and seared turnip cakes, however, stick with the checklist system at this latest dim sum addition, where these and other made-to-order snacks (try the giant crabmeat dumpling with soup inside) arrive piping hot, still crisp and extremely delicious.

Even haute cuisine can have humble roots. From the sidewalk-stacked cardboard boxes outside Chung Wah Hong, Oringer plucks fresh lychee nuts and crooked-neck purple eggplants. (Let's face it: Shaw's doesn't carry any of those ingredients, not to mention dried chrysanthemums or bulging live sea conch.) Lily buds for Toro, Clio and KO Prime hail from neighboring Ming's Supermarket, while Super 88's Essex Street shop (currently under renovation) carries duck tongues, Korean chili threads and the young coconuts his bartenders juice for mixing their upscale cocktails.

7. Hong Kong BBQ

Vinh Sun BBQ and Restaurant
58 Beach St., Boston
617-338-1368

This category needs only two words of introduction: meat candy. Whether it's mahogany slabs of char siu, marinated roast chicken swaddled in wax paper (Oringer's go-to, to-go meal) or bronzed whole ducks, the carnivorous window treatments at Vinh Sun—many dripping sticky glaze onto sheets of aluminum foil—leave passersby with their noses pressed against the glass.

8. Pho

Pho Hoa
17 Beach St., Boston
617-423-3934
phohoa.com

All chain restaurants should be this good. This Vietnamese franchise's rich, cloudy broth tastes like it was made the hard way—simmered with meat bones for hours. Come cold-weather time, forgo trusty chicken noodle in favor of Pho's two-dozen slurpable bowlfuls of meat (try the rib eye, tendon and tripe combo), springy rice ribbons and aromatic trimmings.

9. Poultry

Wing's Live Poultry
48 Beach St., Boston
617-426-5960

Wing's Live Poultry may not be for the faint of heart, but that's not because the fowl isn't fresh. Nod your head toward a fat, still-quacking muscovy duck or black-fleshed silkie chicken, and bam! There it lands on the checkout counter, the deed done out back, and your dinner tied up neatly in a plastic bag.

10. Taiwanese

Taiwan Café
34 Oxford St., Boston
617-426-8181

This homey hideaway's chili-infused ma po tofu and braised pork-belly bun with sour greens and sugar offer two reminders. First, both China and Japan once ruled the tiny island these chefs call home. Second, a little patience goes a long way; even when it's not indicated, the 20-minute warning applies to most dishes, and they're worth the wait. ***

Movies Edited by Nick Altschuller and Amanda Knorr

Capsules by Sean Burns

Burn After Reading ★★★ ½ Don't be fooled by the vibrant colors of Emmanuel Lubezki's cinematography or the giant cartoon performances of the cast, because Joel and Ethan Coen's follow-up to their masterful No Country for Old Men is every bit as bleak as its Oscar-lauded predecessor. It's just a heck of a lot funnier. For reasons too convoluted to explain here, Brad Pitt's exuberant himbo gym instructor tries blackmailing John Malkovich's boozy CIA burnout, with more than a few unforeseen complications arriving via George Clooney's sleazy lothario and Tilda Swinton as the world's meanest pediatrician. Shot, cut and scored with the ominous overtones of a paranoid thriller yet performed as broad farce for maximum dissonance, the Coens send all this silliness spiraling into bloodshed with clockwork precision. Like most of the movies from these gifted, dyspeptic brothers, Burn is secretly about the tragic smallness of people and the fatality of self-absorption. Every character is doomed by assuming they're more important to the plot than they actually are. (At Boston Common, Fenway and in the suburbs.)

The Dark Knight ★★★ ½ Astoundingly ambitious, The Dark Knight is summer blockbuster as dialectical exercise. It's a philosophical debate among agents of order and chaos, punctuated with the spectacle of a depressed billionaire in flying-rodent drag beating up a psychotic clown. Preoccupied, as most of us have been for the past seven years, with how far one must go to combat an inexplicable enemy, the film wrestles with so many meaty ideas and timely concerns, you can't quite wrap your head around it all in just one viewing. As the Joker, Heath Ledger's final completed performance is the sort of roiling, balls-to-the-wall turn from which legends are made. And director Christopher Nolan ruthlessly whittles every interaction down to the barest of essentials. Yet, he cuts so quickly in and out of scenes we hardly have time to absorb vital information. The film might be too aggressive and propulsive for its own good. It's about a half-hour of breathing room away from the masterpiece it yearns to be. (At Boston Common, Fenway and in the suburbs.)

Death Race ★★ This typical, kinda crummy end-of-summer Jason Statham vehicle lacks the grisly satirical edge of Roger Corman's 1975 cult classic, Death Race 2000, and instead plays more like a cross between The Running Man and a video game. Statham stars as a tediously noble former NASCAR driver framed for murder and tossed into a maximum-security facility where inmates must vie for their freedom in souped-up dragsters armed with .50-caliber machine guns. The rules of the road follow PlayStation logic, complete with glowing manhole covers that trigger the weapons cache and handy CGI screenshots to update us on the standings and high scores. Obviously this is dumber than a bag of rocks, but the overqualified supporting cast has a grand time nonetheless. Joan Allen is a hoot as the wicked warden and goofs on her ice-queen image with giddy aplomb. Deadwood's Ian McShane tags along for the ride as a mouthy grease monkey, his eyes twinkling with delight at the desperately silly dialogue. (At Fenway and in the suburbs.)

Ghost Town ★★ David Koepp is Hollywood's go-to screenplay fixer for every big-budget production plagued with multiple drafts of conflicting scripts from various writers. Whether we're talking Mission: Impossible, Spider-Man or the most recent Indiana Jones, Koepp can be counted on to synthesize it all into something filmable. So it's fitting that his latest directorial effort is a mishmash of Always, The Sixth Sense, Groundhog Day and at least a dozen other, more original movies. Ricky Gervais, the brilliant creator of BBC's The Office and Extras, slums for a Hollywood paycheck as a curmudgeonly dentist who sees dead people, while Greg Kinnear's obnoxious tuxedoed specter haunts him into busting up the remarriage plans of widow Téa Leoni. Koepp's camera placement is as prosaic as his cut-and-paste screenplay, with the only fresh air arriving via Gervais' invaluable ad-libbing and surprising chemistry with Leoni. The unlikely couple tries in vain to make the movie more than an exhausted photocopy. (At Boston Common, Fenway and in the suburbs.)

Hamlet 2 ★★ ½ You've heard of a comedy of embarrassment, now get ready for a comedy of abject mortification. For whatever reason, British superstar Steve Coogan has yet to score much traction in the States, but that should change after this erratic, eventually hilarious farce. Coogan stars as a shameless high-school drama teacher who pens an ill-advised sequel to Shakespeare's masterpiece in the hopes of salvaging his school's endangered theatre program. He gets more than he bargained for once word of his production's tacky blasphemy

YOU KNOW THE ONE ABOUT the stripper who heard blondes are more susceptible to skin cancer, so she dyed her hair?

That gag's par for the course in Choke, actor-turned-director Clark Gregg's cheerfully offensive, vividly written and visually pedestrian adaptation of Chuck Palahniuk's cult novel. Like most Palahniuk books, it's an extensively annotated manual of modern male malaise that applies apocalyptic portents before finally insisting that young guys get over themselves and quit wallowing in self-pity. He's always a fun read, even if a sameness creeps in over the course of several novels.

Choke stars indie MVP Sam Rockwell as Victor Mancini, a self-loathing med school dropout. He wastes his days as a living-history interpreter, portraying "the backbone of colonial America" at a Sturbridge Village–styled theme park, baling hay and trying to avoid anachronisms while hitting on the milkmaids. As Victor's meager salary can't cover his mom's nursing home bills, he's got a nifty side job pretending to choke at upscale restaurants.

Deep in his sour heart, Victor believes his con is doing folks a favor, as whomever steps up to give him the Heimlich gets a grand moment of public heroism. People tend to enjoy feeling like they've saved someone's life, so they don't mind when Victor hits them up for money a few months down the road.

But his mom (Anjelica Huston) is getting worse. Spiraling into dementia, she doesn't even recognize her son. Constantly hinting at a startling revelation regarding his parentage, but never quite confessing, the addled Ida Mancini is really just continuing a cycle of abuse she began decades ago. We learn via flashbacks that in-between incarcerations and hospital stays, she abducted young Victor from his various foster homes to pack his head with paranoid delusions—and once even allowed him to be mauled by a lynx.

Such a traumatic childhood goes a long way toward explaining Victor's inveterate sex addiction. He cruises 12-step meetings for anonymous restroom hookups and indulges in behavior that gives "flying the friendly skies" a new meaning. It's a squalid, sad existence, played with heroic, profane gusto by Rockwell, with a slow self-awareness that dawns only after the arrival of Ida's new physician (Kelly Macdonald) and the kooky possibility of divine intervention in his inception.

Nobody does dirtbag heroes better than Rockwell. As in his breakthrough role, playing oversexed CIA assassin and game show host Chuck Barris in George Clooney's underrated directorial debut, Confessions of a Dangerous Mind, Rockwell brings pathos to appalling behavior. You never lose sight of the lost little boy lurking beneath all those bad stripper jokes and blasphemous asides.

As a first-time director, Gregg had his work cut out for him wrangling Palahniuk's unwieldy provocations and off-topic asides into a coherent narrative. He's also got a hard act to follow, as back in 1999 David Fincher applied a prankish wizardry to the author's tonally and thematically similar Fight Club. Blessed with more than seven times the paltry budget of Choke, Fincher was able to incorporate all sorts of special effects and directorial curlicues to find a visual corollary for Palahniuk's saw-toothed prose. Upon initial release, Fight Club was a critical and financial disaster that cost more than a few studio executives their jobs, but the film's reputation has grown massive via home video and the midnight movie circuit, casting a long shadow over any subsequent Palahniuk adaptations, especially Choke.

Gregg knows better than to try to match Fincher's aesthetic choices, so he heads miles in the opposite direction by aiming for grungy authenticity. The terrific cinematographer Tim Orr, renowned for getting gorgeous images on shoestring budgets, has perversely been enlisted to make Choke look as cruddy as possible. Shot on what appears to be grainy 16mm film, the movie takes place entirely in cramped apartments, filthy bathrooms, antiseptic hospitals and other deliberately drab settings.

It's gutsy to attempt to ground Palahniuk's flights of fancy in the ugliness of everyday surroundings, but it eventually undercuts this very funny film once Choke's storyline exits the realm of the rational. There's much ado about underground stem cell research and the foreskin of Jesus Christ, preserved for use in secret Vatican cloning laboratories. By this point, Victor is often hallucinating and suffering severe gastrointestinal distress due to an unfortunate anal bead incident that mercifully remains off-screen. But Gregg keeps the same square visual schematic throughout, which walls the audience out of Victor's obsessive fog. It's unfortunate, because for Choke's third act to pay off the way it does on the printed page, we need to share Victor's mania, not just observe it. ✖✖✖ reaches the media. (The short version: Jesus Christ borrows his dad's time machine in order to rescue all the characters that died at the end of Hamlet.) Director Andrew Fleming tends to err on the side of volume, blowing up jokes a few sizes larger than they need to be. But this weakness becomes a strength once the curtain rises on the play itself, a gaudy craptacular of such epic tastelessness that it alone is worth the price of admission. The final reel redeems a lot of early sins. (At Boston Common, Fenway and in the suburbs.)

The House Bunny ★★ ½ Ditzy, perennial scene-stealer Anna Faris is often the best thing in some extremely bad movies. Hopefully that'll change after this cheerful lark in which Faris finally takes center stage. The ebullient bubble-brain stars as an aging Playboy Playmate banished from Hef's mansion after her 27th birthday. As we're informed, "That's 59 in Bunny Years." Faris soon finds herself nurturing a misfit sorority full of sad, nerdy girls, but the inevitable makeovers and education in men's magazine philosophies take a couple of unforeseen turns. Legally Blonde screenwriters Karen McCullah Lutz and Kirsten Smith recycle huge chunks of their previous script, as, once again, the campus bimbo proves brighter than expected. Directed with indifference by Fred Wolf, The House Bunny is carried by killer comic turns by Faris and her costar Emma

Grindhouse Galore

If the off-colored dialogue doesn't leave you cringing, then the bargain-basement special effects should do the trick at the Brattle Theatre's Return to the Grindhouse series. On Oct. 2, Isaac Hayes stars as a modern-day bounty hunter in Truck Turner—giving an L.A. pimp the shaft and busting bad guys in a fashion that could inspire jealousy in Duane "Dog" Chapman. Film and TV veteran Yaphet Kotto joins Hayes as they make a healthy living by making living unhealthy in this 1974 blaxploitation classic.

Brett Boisvert

Stone. The former makes wide-eyed obliviousness endearing, while Stone's snorting dorkiness is a revelation. They both deserve a better movie. (At Boston Common, Fenway and in the suburbs.)

Mamma Mia! ★ ½ I guess there's something to be said for the unabashed lack of inhibition displayed by these actors. And this slovenly adaptation of the long-running jukebox musical is nothing if not high-spirited; in fact, few major motion pictures feel so much like drunken karaoke parties. But the trouble is that stage director Phyllida Lloyd has been placed at the helm without understanding how movies work. The performances are all broader than barn doors, and the camera zigzags in every direction without ever landing in the right place. Pay no attention to the cheeky paternity plotline; it's all just a thin pretext for our stars to bellow ABBA tunes, the majority of which have no connection to what's happening onscreen. The discombobulated choreography reeks of amateur hour, and Meryl Streep gives it her all, which is frankly too much by half. Still, she fares better than costar Pierce Brosnan, whose agonized vocal bleats sound like the death throes of a freshly slaughtered yak. (At Boston Common and in the suburbs.)

Man on Wire ★★★ ½ Funny how the most exciting heist picture in ages turns out to be a documentary. Director James Marsh's artfully crafted, edge-of-your-seat adventure tells the tale of tightrope walker Philipe Petit, who one morning in 1974 danced on a high-wire between the World Trade Center's Twin Towers. Combining hyperbolically shot reenactments and stunning archival footage with the gregarious reminiscences of Petit and his band of coconspirators, Marsh lays out the elaborate break-in with the snap precision and cinematic verve of a Danny Ocean caper. All the more poignant for never once mentioning 9/11, the movie uses old photographs to let the majestic towers speak for themselves, which lends Man On Wire a shade of sorrow the filmmaker is wise enough not to push. Petit is a florid and quixotic interview subject perfectly in sync with the film's evocation of the anything-goes paradise that was New York City in the 1970s. The breathtaking climax triggers many contradictory emotions as Petit's stunt was so reckless, so foolish and so magical. (At Coolidge Corner, Kendall Square and Waltham Embassy.)

Pineapple Express ★★★ Cheech and Chong meets Tango and Cash in this zonked riff on Reagan-era buddy comedies from the Superbad writing team of Seth Rogen and Evan Goldberg. Rogen stars as a slacker process server who accidentally stumbles into a crooked-cop drug war. Seeking refuge at the pad of his gleefully addled pot dealer (a revelatory James Franco), Rogen is mistaken for a world-class hitman, which prompts all sorts of wild car chases and narrow escapes for these two gloriously inept heroes. Directed by art-house favorite David Gordon Green, Pineapple Express has a grand time goofing on 1980s action-movie iconography, even boasting a brand-new theme song by Huey Lewis and the News! The kick here is watching familiar formulas subverted because our protagonists are baked out of their skulls. Like most Judd Apatow productions, this one's a bit too willing to follow the performers along improvised tangents, but a fundamental sweetness carries the day. (At Boston Common, Fenway and in the suburbs.)

Righteous Kill ★ It's just sad. Thirteen years ago Al Pacino and Robert De Niro teamed up to deliver towering performances in Michael Mann's intricate cops-and-robbers epic Heat, in which they shrewdly mined their iconic '70s personas to set a '90s standard for alpha male swagger. Now they're together again for Jon Avnet's atrocious Righteous Kill, a cheap, gimmicky vigilante thriller adept only at showing just how far the mighty have fallen. Both actors are at least two decades too old for their roles as beat detectives tracking a serial killer who hunts bad guys and writes lousy poetry. A bored Pacino chews a lot of gum and bugs his eyes out occasionally, while De Niro's work is a genuine tragedy. Lazy and overweight, he mopes and mumbles his way through the movie unable to convincingly portray anger.

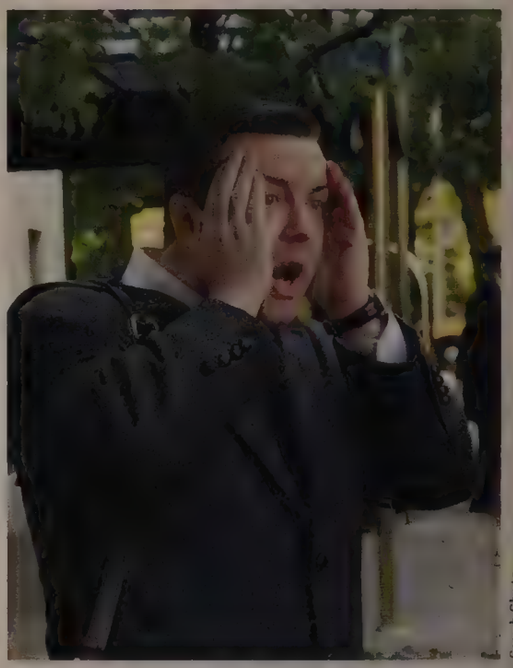
Russell Gewirtz's sorry screenplay hinges on a plot twist telegraphed from the very first frames, so Avnet ladles on the labored misdirection and misogyny to distract us from the obvious. Depressing. (At Boston Common, Fenway and in the suburbs.)

Star Wars: The Clone Wars ★ Stinky the Hutt? Seriously? Hopefully concluding the process of diminishment that began in the '90s with "Special Editions" of the original trilogy and continued with the misbegotten prequels, George Lucas offers one final insult to anyone who grew up playing with fake light sabers. This soulless cash-grab is actually the first three episodes of an upcoming Cartoon Network series ineptly stitched together and tossed onto the big screen where the cheap animation and tinny music come off worse than even Darth George could have imagined. The garbled plot is late-model Lucas nonsense about trade route negotiations and baffling blockades. Jabba the Hutt's son Stinky is kidnapped by Sith Lords for strategic purposes, and if the flatulent baby slug isn't off-putting enough, turns out Jabba's also got a gay uncle with a Truman Capote lisp. Looks like childhood is officially over, boys and girls; we don't have to care about Star Wars anymore. (In the suburbs.)

Towelhead ★ ½ Hack sitcom writer Alan Ball is at it again with this empty provocation that's nearly as classy and subtle as its title. Based on the acclaimed novel by Alicia Erian, the movie desperately wants to be pushy and transgressive, but it's so airless and devoid of empathy that it feels hermetically sealed inside a bubble of smugness. Summer Bishil stars as Jasira, a half-Lebanese adolescent in a Texas suburb who struggles with her burgeoning sexuality. She's so traumatized by tampons that a colleague dubbed the film Are You There, Allah? It's Me Margaret. The movie rallies disgust for Aaron Eckhart, the army reservist neighbor and proud Texan who graphically molests young Jasira. Ball deals with some loaded imagery, basically depicting the U.S. military raping a Middle Eastern virgin. But the metaphor never coalesces into anything beyond exploitation. Towelhead keeps kicking around explosive signifiers and shock-value moments that Ball doesn't have a clue how to handle. (At Harvard Square, Coolidge Corner and Waltham Embassy.)

Tropic Thunder ★★★ Ben Stiller's scabrous Hollywood satire misses about as often as it hits, so it's good those hits are vicious. Sending up the absurd egomania of Tinseltown's elite, the flick follows a handful of prima donnas on an ill-fated attempt to infuse a tacky Vietnam War epic with method-acting madness. Stiller is merely adequate as a musclebound action hero seeking artistic credibility, but the character's misguided attempt to woo Academy voters by portraying a mentally challenged, buck-toothed stutterer named Simple Jack might be the best skewering of Oscar pandering ever filmed. Equally audacious is Robert Downey Jr.'s transcendent turn as a pompous Australian playing an African-American GI. There's no way the bit should work, but Downey is such a magician it's somehow charming. Less successful are one-note mug-a-thons from Jack Black and Tom Cruise, and the movie's wobbly structure exposes Stiller's sketch comedy roots. But whenever Tropic Thunder lands a blow, it hurts. (At Boston Common, Fenway and in the suburbs.)

Vicky Cristina Barcelona ★★ ½ Though problematic and slightly sloppy, this pleasant trifle



Sarah Shatz

Peek-a-Boo

High Spirits

No need to avert your eyes from stars Ricky Gervais and Téa Leoni in the comedy Ghost Town. But the rest is a little scary.

is Woody Allen's most consistent effort since 1999's loopy La Strada remake, Sweet and Lowdown. Rebecca Hall and Scarlett Johansson star as Vicky and Cristina, American postgrads spending a summer in Spain. Enter Javier Bardem's free-spirited Latin lover and stock stereotype, who probably would be risible if played by any other actor. Bardem delivers his loosest, goofiest performance yet, embracing the role's mildewed clichés with contagious delight. Romantic entanglements and disentanglements ensue, complicated by stomach ulcers, girl-girl crushes and ill-advised rushes to the altar. The most fun comes from Bardem's ex-wife, a lusty psycho played in a movie-stealing turn by Penélope Cruz. Allen's direction is perkier and more alert than his recent work; he even moves the camera once in a while, soaking up the Barcelona scenery and gazing adoringly on his good-looking cast. Modest in both aim and accomplishment, it's hardly a return to form, but it'll do. (At Boston Common, Coolidge Corner, Kendall Square and Waltham Embassy.)

Wall-E ★★★★ Here's one for the ages. The crowning achievement from Pixar Animation Studios depicts a ruined Earth, some seven hundred years in the future, where a lonely trash compactor sorts his way through mountains of garbage, his only friend a remarkably resilient cockroach. Owing more to Charlie Chaplin than Bugs Bunny, the staggering early reels of Wall-E are devoid of any dialogue, working in a language of pure visual expression and brilliant soundscapes by Star Wars guru Ben Burtt. The lovesick travails of our adorable title character are as moving as any movie I've seen. In the second half, director Andrew Stanton switches gears into a less lyrical, more aggressively satirical mode, and introduces us to a future of overfed coach potatoes stranded in space after wrecking our planet. It's a pretty savage social commentary, but I was more interested in Wall-E and Eve, his shiny iPod-looking babe who packs a mean phaser and enlists a cuckoo's nest of malfunctioning robots to help save us all from bad programming. It's an instant classic. (At Boston Common and in the suburbs.)

The Women ★★ The best joke in Diane English's klutzy update of George Cukor's 1939 classic might be the overabundance of screamingly obvious Boston locations, even though characters onscreen insist they're standing in Manhattan. Meg Ryan attempts to emote through some dire plastic surgery, puckering her inflated trout-pout after finding her hubby having an affair with Eva Mendes, an actress as curvy as her line readings are flat. Annette Bening rallies the rest of the Ya-Ya Sisterhood of the Traveling Whatever, and lots of shrieking ensues. There's a surprisingly complex, scene-stealing turn from Candice Bergen as Ryan's seen-it-all mom and a few good character riffs from guest-stars Cloris Leachman and Bette Midler, but English, creator of Murphy Brown, suffers from a visually inert TV sensibility. The Women feels more like a promising sitcom pilot, one that's somehow easier to take simply because none of these characters are as narcissistic, materialistic or disgusting as the ones in Sex and the City. (At Boston Common, Fenway and in the suburbs.)

FOXES ON THE HUNT

Seattle's next great band taps a different shade of harmony.

Fleet Foxes play the Somerville Theatre Oct. 6.

David Belisle

THE ONLY THING FLEET ABOUT Fleet Foxes is the fledging Seattle fivesome's quiet ascent as a critically adored indie-pop phenomenon within a matter of months.

The folky group's eponymous debut album captivates with ethereal harmonies, echoing the multitiered dimension of '60s influences the Beach Boys and Crosby, Stills, Nash & Young or the Bruegel painting of Renaissance peasants on the CD cover. Think of My Morning Jacket mellowed out on madrigal rounds. Unrushed and earthy in tone, and evocative of a distant time and place, it's the perfect iPod companion for a twilight stroll through the woods.

The Improper Bostonian

"We use harmony like an arrangement tool," lead singer and songwriter Robin Pecknold says. "Vocals became a way to add a certain depth to the music that would normally be filled with strings or horns or something that we didn't have at our disposal, because we were recording in my basement for the most part. And it was all live. There wasn't much of a chance to add lushness through instrumentation."

The band's music is still deftly cushioned by acoustic and electric guitars, mandolin, dulcimer, keyboards, bass and percussion. But instruments play a supportive role to the vocals—and Pecknold's winsome, reverb-enhanced voice is rarely alone for long. "It became more fascinating to have everybody involved on the vocal side," he says, "instead of 'Here's this song where it's just me, la de da.'"

Pecknold, 22, found collaborative joy in music from an early age in the Seattle suburb of Kirkland. His earliest endeavors came as a kid performing in community musicals and school plays. "That's kind of how I learned to sing," he says. By his teenage years, Pecknold was shuffling through his parents' record collection, listening to the Beach Boys, CSNY, Simon & Garfunkel, Steeleye Span, the Zombies, Joni Mitchell and especially Bob Dylan, who, he says, "opened the doors to everything else from that time."

Pecknold's parents were encouraging. His father wrote songs and his mother played piano, and they gave acoustic guitars to him and his two older siblings. "They were never really strict enough for me to want to rebel," Pecknold says. "I loved what they did and were into." Family sing-alongs ensued and grew more frequent in recent years, he says.

But Pecknold found his true accomplice for both music and video games in Fleet Foxes guitarist Skye Skjelset, whom he met in seventh grade. When they weren't locked in rounds of Final Fantasy, they were playing or absorbing music—even in the junior high science lab, where a teacher enjoyed prog-rockers Yes and Rush. "We'd just talk with him and listen to music. He was a cool, aware guy."

Later, when they got day jobs, Pecknold and Skjelset spent their free time tinkering with songs and finally launched Fleet Foxes in 2006. The group eventually settled into its current lineup of keyboardist Casey Wescott, bassist Christian Wargo and drummer Joshua Tillman. And producer Phil Ek (Modest Mouse, Built to Spill, the Shins) deserves credit for honing the patchwork of home and studio recordings that became Fleet Foxes and their preceding EP Sun Giant, released in March.

It's the perfect iPod companion for a twilight stroll through the woods.

The discs have drawn rave reviews from press on both sides of the Atlantic, with Mojo calling Fleet Foxes "America's next great band." And the group has earned equal praise for its concerts. Its current tour hits the Somerville Theatre Oct. 6—a big jump from the Middle East Upstairs in June.

But don't expect the long-haired, bearded Pecknold to act like a star onstage. For starters, he prefers to sing and play guitar from a central chair. "That felt like less of an entertainment," he says from his Seattle home before heading back on tour. "I thought if I was sitting down, I wouldn't be compelled to make an aerobics exercise out of the performance. When I go to shows, it's to listen to music. I don't care about stage presence particularly.

"Then the very last show we played a couple days ago, I stood up for the first time in a while," Pecknold adds. "That was weird—and just as boring to watch." ✖✖✖

Twice Around the Block

The Kids Are Alright Beverly Hills 90210 is on the air and New Kids on the Block are selling out concerts. No, it's not 1994. The Boston boys are now men and hanging tough once again. Unlike other reunion tours made up mostly of pod people, Donnie, Joey, Danny, Jordan and Jonathan have all returned. With a chart-climbing song featuring Ne-Yo and their own MySpace page, the guys seem ready for a 2008 comeback. You can catch them at the TD Banknorth Garden Sept. 26 and 28. Just watch out for 30-year-old groupies still clutching their Joey McIntyre action figures. Lindsay Scalera

CALITERRA
CAL-ITAL BAR & GRILLE

Dine. Drink. Dish.

Caliterra, a unique and innovative concept in casual upscale dining, is newly revitalized by Chef Julia Brant's comfort classics cuisine. Enjoy tantalizing cocktails and an extensive wine list matched with the new menu.

The dining room is perfect for lunch and dinner seven days a week, and is welcoming with original terrazzo flooring, warm amber lighting, and a beautiful private dining room evoking images of a wine tasting room in Sonoma.

Call to book your next private event in Caliterra's Wine Room, accommodating up to 18. Caliterra also welcomes events up to 150. Please call for more details.

Caliterra has earned high praise for both the new menu and the service, receiving "Absolutely Two Thumbs Up" from TV Diner, New England Cable News.

THE NORTH END'S ONLY ROOFTOP DINING AND VOTED "THE HOTTEST SPOT TO DRINK AND DINE"

"I take cooking very personally!"

It's a gift. When Fiore meets somebody he can sense what they would like to eat. Sometimes he knows before they do. From his Carpaccio di Manzo* to his Costata di Vitello he has the gustatory masterpiece that will satisfy all your senses. So, if Fiore says you look like a fish or maybe a little duck, it's not an insult. He's just sizing you up for the meal of a lifetime. Fiore cooks with you in mind.

250 Hanover Street • Boston's North End

We're stuck in our ways and proud of it.

We have been serving generations of families, locals and tourists in the North End since 1931. People crave the taste of our food. Some say their mouths water just thinking about eating here. That's why when we change even the slightest thing, they let us know it. Some things should stay just as they are.

Scared to Death

Morbid Musings

Have you thought about your approaching demise lately? Allow Julian Barnes to remind you of your mortality when he presents his memoir, Nothing to Be Frightened Of, at the Coolidge Corner Theatre on Sept. 26. A witty meditation on death and its relation to his family, religion and daily life, Barnes' book may have you writing your own bucket list, or at least looking both ways before crossing Beacon Street.

Rockie Horoscope {ROCKIE GARDINER}

BALANCING ACT

[SEPTEMBER 23–OCTOBER 22]
It's been six years since Mercury last went retrograde in Libra, so you might not know how to handle the delays and disappointments that usually occur. Be cool. Let the information concerning your life and the conversations about your intentions or desires drift in and out like a breeze. Avoid getting hung up on any one idea or position; chances are those will change, perhaps more than once, by the time Mercury enters Scorpio on Election Day. Except for revising your guest list, the prognosis for a happy birthday looks good.

SCORPIO [October 23–November 21]
First comes love, then comes… not marriage as much as a boost to your libido. Affectionate Venus entered Scorpio on Sept. 23, and 10 days later your horny Mars coruler comes across. Because it's been two years since Mr. Macho last visited your sign, take time to appreciate the benefits and make the most of the opportunities he brings. You could fill the days in between arrivals worrying about how Mercury's retrograde trip affects you. But until Mercury finally arrives in Scorpio on Election Day, its message might elude you.

SAGITTARIUS [November 22–December 21] Besides attending gala events celebrating the new season, Archers will spend the next few weeks with some of their more compatible companions. Going to a Libra birthday party is a sure way to put a smile on your face and come away with a terrific story to dine out on. Although they may not be your bosom buddies, Librans approach life with a philosophical attitude similar to yours. Therefore Mercury retrogressing through this intelligent air sign would be a good time for both party animals to support a common cause.

CAPRICORN [December 22–January 20]
Patience may be the key to heaven, but for the next few weeks, it can also be your key to the executive suite. While Mercury drifts back and forth through your Libra career house, try to exercise not your better judgment, but your ability to bide your time. That's because what you think you know could be reversed shortly after Mercury, direct as of Oct. 15, leaves "fair and balanced" Libra for surreptitious Scorpio on Election Day. This holds especially true for folks like Barack Obama who have Capricorn rising.

AQUARIUS [January 21–February 18]
Simply: Flirt. While vivacious Venus commandeers your Scorpio midheaven, you could try reasoning with employers, community leaders and other people who can affect your career and reputation. However, logic won't get you what you want as much as a knowing look, a suggestive smile or a well-timed compliment would. You don't have to follow through, but for the next few weeks, certainly while retrograde Mercury favors imaginative Neptune in your sign, you can fake it. If you're Sarah Palin, do this until the election is over.

PISCES [February 19–March 19]
Mercury changing direction in your Libra house of other people's money suggests that information and paperwork relating to mutual funds, mortgages and inheritance matters won't be coming forthwith. Take the retrograde time frame (Sept. 24–Oct. 15) into consideration when scheduling meetings and making plans. However, this isn't the time to shut down your active imagination, not while your Neptune ruler finds favor with folks willing to share their resources with you. Just not their money, not yet.

ARIES [March 20–April 19]
Can't faith move mountains anymore? Why not give the concept the old college try while your single-minded, crusading Mars ruler favors idealistic, imaginative Neptune? Feel free to enlist the help of a significant other, like your lawyer, before Mars exits the sign of the Scales on Oct. 3 to delve into intriguing, often inexplicable Scorpion mysteries. For a wider base of support, turn to a group of like-minded associates with technical skills. They could help make what you envision visible to the skeptics.

TAURUS [April 20–May 20]
With your Venus ruler nestled in your Scorpio marriage house, you should be able to endure, possibly even bypass the usual annoyances that'll arise while Mercury is retrograde Sept. 24–Oct. 15. Be sure to use this time to work out differences with coworkers and service providers; just don't sign anything legally binding until Mercury is done reviewing and revising. Even if you're in a committed relationship, Venus in sexy Scorpio can be the magnet drawing attractive, artistic people to your house.

GEMINI [May 21–June 20]
Remember these dates: Sept. 24 when your Mercury ruler goes retrograde and Oct. 15 when it turns direct. Since precious little progress will be made during those three weeks, consider disconnecting from your typical workaday routine. That is one way to avoid the ensuing delays and hassles. Because Mercury flips in your Libra house of recreation and entertainment, you can focus instead on opening nights, the new TV season or the playoffs. What are the chances of tracking down an ex-lover and rekindling that romance? Too risky?

CANCER [June 21–July 22]
The changing of the seasons seems to affect cardinal signs like yours more than the rest. Nevertheless, Crabs mourning the end of summer, their season in the sun, can take heart. After affectionate Venus enters your Scorpio house of pleasurable pursuits on Sept. 23, you have four weeks to knock yourself out before the goddess moves into your workplace. In the interim, matters at home may need more attention since Mercury retrograde will have you reviewing decisions you've recently made for another month. No major purchases before then.

LEO [July 23–August 22]
Is now the time to pay the piper? Lions who've been playing fast and loose or having fun with someone else's funds may have had to pony up when their sun ruler and subversive, subterranean Pluto square off this weekend. Secrets tend to surface when Pluto's chains get rattled. Mercury retrograde in your Libra house of communication and education can hinder rather than help the research process. Retrograde doesn't support smooth trips or vehicles to take them in—so no buying cars or bikes until mid-October.

VIRGO [August 23–September 22]
Read for Gemini for the timetable. Although Mercury is your ruling planet too, the Messenger's latest retrograde takes place in your Libra house of assets, acquisitions and attitudes, not your recreation area. If you change your mind about a purchase or reevaluate its worth, so be it. No reason to fret because your original decision didn't work out to your satisfaction. However, if something major like a bank error cannot easily be fixed, try to maintain a semblance of Libran equilibrium. Don't go off half-cocked.

TABLE FOR EIGHT

BOSTON - BEST WAY TO MEET

as seen in The Improper Bostonian

REALITY DINING

TABLE FOR EIGHT (866 822-5348 OR WWW.TABLEFOREIGHT.COM)
IS A SOCIAL INTRODUCTION SERVICE

Table for Eight replicates the way people used to meet by bringing people physically together to dine. Indeed, many members of this 20-year-old service are disillusioned on-line daters who are tired of the cat-and-clicking-mouse games of such contacts and their frequent deceptions. Table for Eight people span in age from late 20s to late 40s with a smattering of baby boomers. Typical members have been busy cultivating their professional lives with an income averaging $73,000, perhaps figuratively married to their career but now considering the corporeal variation. 85 percent haven't been married yet and are childless.

The actual table — located at a restaurant like Sibling Rivalry, Cucci Cucina or Le Mistral — must be round, no harsh, excluding edges. This serendipity of strangers brought together has been compared to the gemutlich flavor of wedding reception dinners. You can dine with such scintillating types as physicians, lawyers, psychologists, and teachers and scientists from local prestigious universities. An initial phone interview involving 50 questions screens members and identifies interests, views and preferences.

Although friendship and networking are benefits of dining with new people, Table for Eight also boasts at least 60 engagements, that they know of, that have resulted from their restaurant get-togethers in the last five years.

LUSH GARDEN

Frances Rivera and Deanna Lites at Beat the Heat

In Vino Veritas...

To thank its staunchest supporters, Community Servings hosted a cocktail party in the Cambridge garden of executive director David Waters, and it's impossible to imagine a better way to spend a balmy, late summer's evening.

To begin with, there was the setting, which was perfectly lovely. Then there were delicious things to nosh on, like lobster gazpacho served in a cucumber. Finally, there was the guest list, which included the likes of design avatar Shawn McBride, intrepid travelers Ed Knudsen and Louis Mula, the ubiquitous Joan and Robert B. Parker, and others of an equally sparkly ilk.

J. Nichols at Beat the Heat

Overheard by the bar: "I've had enough water for today. I'd better switch to wine."

It's Getting Hot in Here...

Global warming might make it easier to wear kicky little sundresses year-round, but the downside is too grim to contemplate, which is why the Earthwatch Institute hosted its second annual Beat the Heat gala under the Washburn Pavilion at the Museum of Science.

Kicky little sundresses were de rigueur, as the astonishingly good-looking crowd sipped cocktails, ate little nibbles and watched yours truly compete against WHDH-Channel 7's Frances Rivera in a mock game show about climate change. (Sorry for kicking your ass, Frances.)

Among the throng: hunky scientist J. Nichols (who spoke about his work protecting sea turtles), the ever-affable Ed Amaral, brunette bombshell Alex Rossi, lady of leisure Regina Dinkes, the incorrigible Bill Deacon, development diva Janet Goff and the delightful Dr. Deanna Lites, to name a mere handful.

As soon as the sun went down, the crowd was wowed by fire jugglers, which, frankly, was a helluva lot more entertaining than watching me beat Frances in a contest about climate change. Then again, I did win a grass skirt and a lei, so at least I have my Halloween costume for this year.

Estrogen Overload...

Whoever put the guest list together for the premiere of the filmed-in-Boston chick flick The Women certainly knew what they were doing.

The movie, about a gaggle of rich New York society types, screened at the Loews Boston Common, with a party at the Liberty Hotel afterward, and the audience was a shockingly comprehensive gathering of Boston's pre–face-lift socialites, post–face-lift socialites, heiresses, trophy wives and power chicks (in fact, too numerous to list here).

Speaking of face-lifts, however, one guest did say, "My favorite part of the movie was watching Candice Bergen lecturing Meg Ryan about plastic surgery. I mean, Meg Ryan looks like she's on the scariest roller coaster at the amusement park, for Christ's sake!"

◀ Whose Purse Is Whose?

Ever wonder what those women who always show up on best-dressed lists carry in their purses?

We did, so we cornered Cambridge doyenne Joan Parker and glamazon Frances Rivera at the aforementioned soirees and took an inventory of their handbags.

In one, there were Altoids, lipgloss and glasses.

In the other, there was a cellphone, lipgloss, lipstick, keys, cash, a Saks Fifth Avenue card and a cab voucher.

The first person to correctly guess the owners will win an Improper Bostonian T-shirt, which just might get you onto our best-dressed list. ✖✖✖

Finely Tuned

I decided to leave music to the truly obsessed back in high school. Up through sophomore year, it was all fun and games, the Judybats and the Lemonheads. But overnight it became a full-time commitment—either you knew the next big thing or risked social suicide. So I hopped off the bandwagon and started collecting mix tapes compiled by friends.

Today, instead of tapes, I get CDs from my younger cousin Sara. I have three in my desk drawer right now: Protein, Toast and Red Jumpsuit, in reference to an unfortunate outfit I wore circa 1985. For me, they're shortcuts to pop-culture cred.

And so is reading this issue. Music editor Paul Robicheau's annual list of 10 bands rocking the local scene includes the Toothaches, the December Sound and Mean Creek. Then there's Chester French, whose members Maxwell Drummey and D.A. Wallach grace the cover. Before graduating from Harvard last year, the pop duo landed a record deal with Pharrell Williams. From nerds to working with N.E.R.D.

Ours Is Not to Resin Why

STRING IT ON

ACCORDING TO MASTER violin-maker Marco Coppiardi, "There is no perfect violin. There's only the violin that works with a particular player." He would know. As well as handcrafting and repairing instruments for members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the Borromeo String Quartet and other ensembles around the world, Coppiardi builds meticulous, identical replicas of historical instruments by Stradivarius and Guarneri.

A native of Cremona, one of Italy's ancient instrument-making towns, Coppiardi opened a studio on Newbury Street last year. In a tidy little room hung with scrapers, gouges and files, he builds violins, violas and cellos out of materials like spruce from Val de Fiemme, tiger maple from Bosnia and his own varnish. "Maybe the steel I use is a bit better," he says of the difference between his instruments and the historical originals, most of which are valued in the millions of dollars. Otherwise they're identical. "One couldn't tell the sound apart," he says. One of his current projects is a cello that Andrea Marti made for King Charles IX of France in 1572. "I'll spend 1,200 hours on this."

As well as a scholar's appetite for research, Coppiardi's craft demands that he master the intricacies of physics, geometry and, of course, acoustics (he's currently collaborating on an acoustics project at MIT's Media Lab). "One cannot work in a vacuum," he says. "I came to Boston because the best musicians in the world are here."

Right, Neighborly

The South End Buttery has long presented itself as simple and sunny, while the twain auras of quaint and fashionable hung in the air. Last month, the space expanded with the Buttery Bar-Bistro, allowing more room for mingling and melding. "A lot of people who get their coffee here in the morning come in after work and before they walk their dog," bar manager Tofee Shamatta says. Shamatta's a neighborhood guy who helps give the spot a neighborhood feel. He grew up down the street and lives nearby with his sister, nieces, mother and father, who comes in for Guinness.

For non-paternal patrons, Shamatta offers the Sugar Daddy ($9), a mix of gin, Mathilde framboise, lime juice and hibiscus flower syrup. Though the recipe is adapted from one on the back of the hibiscus-syrup jar, there's a comfort in lo-fi. And he's still particular about the drink's flavor, tinkering and tasting the blend, with only a pause to greet his sister as she passes by. The Sugar Daddy is sweet and sticky with a sugar rim, but it finishes dry with gin and features a jammy, regal garnish of a skewered maraschino-stuffed hibiscus flower. "If people see one, then we'll end up selling a lot," Shamatta says. "Because it's a neighborly place, people will ask, 'Oh, what's he drinking?'"

Good Eats

Sustainable Sandwich

As neighborhood markets go, the supersized sibling of Boylston Street's City Feed and Supply is an eco-shopper's paradise. There's the all-natural dish soap. Hipster baristas brewing free-trade, soy mochaccinos. "Organic" and "local" fruits and veggies—unhusked garbanzo beans and purple potatoes included. And a sandwich counter that piles the fresh produce and nitrate-free lunchmeats high on bread baked a few miles away. Our favorite, the Farmer's Lunch—extra-sharp cheddar, coarse mustard, mayo, pickled green tomatoes and leafy greens on slices of Iggy's or Fornax—generously feeds veg-heads (and company) citywide.

ASK THE EXPERT

JOHN HAUCK OWNER OF THE LIVING ROOM

Q: WHAT KIND OF MUSIC SETS THE MOOD AT A COCKTAIL PARTY?

"When you're picking the soundtrack to a party, I don't think any one style is good for any one party. It all depends on who's attending and what occasion you're celebrating. For an older or more mature crowd, I like to put on some jazz, maybe some John Coltrane or Johnny Hartman. You can tell if something is working by the response from your guests. If people come in and immediately start bobbing their heads, you're doing something right. For the 24 to 28 crowd, I like old-school hip-hop and mashups. At the Living Room, we use DJ Supreme One and DJ Chris Roxx. They always get the party going."

Question for John Wentzell
What were your five favorite fan experiences?

John Wentzell is president of TD Banknorth Garden and Delaware North Companies—Boston.

1. Dane Cook is a memorable performer because he really feeds off the energy of the crowd—and let's just say that a lot of his audience [members] have been at the bars before his shows. They'll yell things at him, and he'll respond. His one-liners and spontaneity with the fans really speak to his abilities as a comedian. One time he actually chased someone back to his seat.

2. Recently Jon Bon Jovi played, and he walked along the top of the hockey dasher boards next to the stage as if they were balance beams singing "Always." The ladies in front were swooning because he was practically in their laps. The band also did a radio promotion, where audience members literally joined them onstage for a few songs. That must have been an amazing experience.

3. Another trend is having satellite stages—always a huge treat for fans. Coldplay was just here. And for part of the set, our security led them down the floor to the other end of the arena, where the fans who had seats in the back went crazy, because for those two or three songs, they had front-row seats. At the Coldplay show, some people found themselves sitting next to Gwyneth Paltrow, Jerry Seinfeld or Steven Spielberg in our Premium Club seats.

4. One of the loudest concerts ever in the Garden happened at Monster Jam, when Jay-Z made a surprise appearance with Kanye West. The electricity in the audience was incredible as the news spread around the building.

5. Justin Timberlake laughed between songs and said that his Boston concert was the loudest crowd he had ever heard, and it was true. His center stage and open floor layout had the audience closer than ever, literally dancing at his feet.

KINOKI DOKEY

Detoxifying foot pads cleanse you of 20 excess dollars.

I FIRST SAW THE infomercial for Kinoki pads on a red-eye back from Vegas. After three days of treating my body like a military test subject, I was a quivering vessel of pollutants and pain. I would have clubbed a baby seal with a sack of newborn kittens to feel clean again, and here was the devil in the voice of a cheery spokeswoman extolling the wonders of pads "based on ancient Japanese reflexology" that would rid me of wastes, chemicals and cellulite. Wasn't really worried about the last one, but I felt the first two in spades. Strapped for cash, the pads went unordered and—with my sputtering hippocampus—were soon forgotten.

The memory resurfaced a few weeks ago when my ex-roommate visited and a friend from Manhattan came to join the ruckus. That Friday we downed IPAs at the Four Winds until close, and Saturday saw a liver blitzkrieg of drinks at Kingston Station, the Hub Pub, Max & Dylans, Silvertone and Lobby. It was a perfect storm of pollution—and the ideal time to see if Kinoki could right our ships.

The Kinoki box ($19.99 at CVS) recommends a two-week cycle with pads on both feet "or other body part" on alternate nights, or on alternate feet every evening. Application is recommended an hour before bedtime, followed by eight to 10 hours of rest, to which my night-owl friend Al remarked, "No crap, if I slept 10 hours a night, I'd feel significantly better regardless." Undeterred by his cynicism, I stuck a pad to my right hoof and dreamt of being free of thulium, thallium and other elements no doubt responsible for all my life's failures up to this point.

I've got two alarms, and I normally hit the snooze twice on both of them. But that Monday, I was up immediately feeling fairly bushy-tailed. My dupable side attributed this to the once-white pad, now brown and smelling of jerky. My more rational side remained skeptical but began to sway the next day, when my friend Adam e-mailed from his office to say he felt energized as well. This seemed like proof. Time-stamped no less. There are many places one could expect to find Adam at 9 am. His desk isn't one of them.

Intrigued, I began applying adhesives with reckless abandon—the preferred approach to alternative medicine. I wore two every night. I stuck another on before going to the gym. One evening I even placed pads on my foot and right above my liver. But in the morning, all I had to show was a glowing rectangle of stomach rash. I was expecting my liver to create an inescapable black hole of filth, but the pad remained unsoiled. Something was amiss, so I consulted the Internet. On YouTube, I found a fellow pseudo-scientist with a similar yet converse problem. "I put the pads on my testicles, and the next morning the pads turned black," wrote scubajenjen. "This would suggest my balls are impure, and they are not!!!" Obviously further testing was needed.

So I spat on 'em. Sure enough, they darkened. Around this time, a friend also directed me to an NPR report that began, "What kind of moron would believe that a toxin-sucking foot pad would really work?" Hey, screw you Sarah Varney of member station KQED. But as she and UC Berkeley scientists discovered, Kinoki is useless; it only takes steam to discolor the pads.

"It's a scam, man," Adam concurred later. "One would think after consuming copious adult bevs they would look darker or smell different, but it was the same regardless if you were imbibing or not." I must agree with my friend and his idiosyncratic diction. Twenty bucks is a lot for a small psychophysical benefit. The smart buy is a case of beer. Even if it's bad, you're sure to feel something. ✖✖✖

Fall Back on Reds

Autumn wine? Yes, it's time we put away those light, cool thirst quenchers and break out the moodier reds again. It's time we start thinking layers, people. Just as you naturally gravitate toward root vegetables and braised, slow-cooked meat, your ideal wine for October should have a bit more flesh on the bone. Earthier, mouth-coating, spicy: These qualities resonate most with the shift in weather. Here are some of the best seasonal expressions.

Villa Pozzi, Nero d'Avola, Sicily, 2006 ($10, Giles Liquors, Woburn). This is one of those silly bargains you stumble across in blind tastings leading you to double check the price. Made from Sicily's indigenous Nero d'Avola grape, aromas of plum, cooked meat, carrot and sage waft up from the glass. There's a sweet spice flavor that lingers in the background, and the tannins are moderate. It screams: autumn! If you're cooking a stew, or making some ribs, this is definitely a must-have companion.

Tablas Creek "Cotes de Tablas," Paso Robles, 2006 ($24, Marty's, Newton). Tablas keeps climbing new heights with each vintage. This lush, juicy red marries Central Coast sunshine with the hearty, gamey essence of its Rhône Valley grape varieties: grenache, syrah, mourvedre and counoise. Raspberry-like, with mineral, tarragon, bay leaf and browned-meat accents, it's a handcrafted estate wine that would go beautifully with grilled sausages.

Master of Wine Sandy Block, vice president of beverage operations for Legal Sea Foods

Renwood "Old Vine" Zinfandel, Amador County, 2004 ($17, Blanchards, Jamaica Plain). What's the story with old vines and zinfandel? The more the vine ages, the fewer grapes it produces. But this scarcity also means more intense flavor. Zin especially benefits from this, and Amador, in California's Sierra Foothills, is an out-of-the-way region whose vineyards feature some of the oldest vines in the state. Renwood is back on target with this extremely full-bodied bruiser that has powerhouse raisin, cocoa and nutmeg flavors. Its velvety style would be perfect with a hanger steak.

Going Out

NAMASTE

The new Mandarin Oriental's signature restaurant is Asana, opening this month. The food is American and Asian. The chef is French. The name is Sanskrit and should be familiar to anyone who's stumbled into a yoga class. Although it doesn't speak to the cuisine, in the multifarious world of hotel dining, flexibility can't hurt.

Running the kitchen is Nicolas Boutin, a man familiar with its demands, coming fresh from the Landmark Mandarin Oriental in Hong Kong. In a short time, Boutin has discovered Boston's weakness for flattery and strength of locality. "The advantage in Boston is you can get everything the same day, and that helps a lot," he explains. "We have great fish and beef. There's nothing I need to import." This focus on regional cuisine plays out in dishes like roasted veal loin with a carrot purée and sautéed clams with a shallot jus. "The idea was to use the good quality of veal," he says, "and I love the combination of earth and ocean."

Boutin also finds inspiration in the cheese room, an enclosed area in the 90-seat, bamboo-and-limestone dining space. He plans on offering fondues and traditional plates like grilled tartins for both Asana and the adjacent M Bar & Lounge. In addition, a chef's table offers a window into the busy kitchen. Just six months into his stay, he's heeding advice from countryman Joel Robuchon. "He said opening a restaurant is like a baby, you need nine months." Though three months away from that magic number, everything at Asana seems aligned. NICK ALTSCHULLER

Beauty

HONEY-DIPPED

Not all sticky situations are bad. The new "Le Peau au Miel" (skin of honey) treatment at Spa Intercontinental is a delicious exception to the rule. My pampering began with an olive oil–and-sugar exfoliant, and then moved onto the honey—three ingredients used at the hotel's restaurant Miel. Following a thorough scrubbing and brushing, I was swaddled in blankets and gently massaged. Once unraveled, I washed off in a private shower and received a final coat of olive oil–infused moisturizer. Afterward, my skin felt smoother and smelled better than I could remember. In fact, the only thing preventing me from licking my arms was knowing that a free jar of the sweet stuff awaited me at checkout. AMANDA KNORR

BRAKE UP

DEAR MR. BUS DRIVER:
Through June you drove the #62 early in the morning. Then you started to drive the #77, where you joked that all of us early-morning passengers must be able to sleep in since you changed bus routes. You're 57 (or so you say, but that's hard to believe) with a bit of a receding hairline and light-blond, brown hair. You're tan and have a bit of a temper (although you say you don't). What routes are you driving now? I enjoyed our chats.

Missing you on Mass. Ave.

Dear Islander:

As a 32-year-old deadbeat dad who has every excuse in the book not to get a résumé together and get an actual J-O-B (God forbid!), I find it sad you were able to sum up your entire summer in one line that began with "I just broke up with a psycho Virgo" and ended with "I'd probably jump your bones because I'm chomping at the bit." Yikes. When we were together, or when I considered us together while you secretly "couldn't have a girlfriend in Boston," I was willing to satiate that bit-chomping problem of yours. However, I remember there being another problem. So what is it? You can only get it up for crazy little girls? Real women scare the blood out of you? You disappoint me. If your summer could be summed up in one line, your entire life can be summed up in just a couple more: "You don't understand. I coulda had class. I coulda been a contender. I coulda been somebody, instead of a bum, which is what I am." How ironic this line's from On the Waterfront.

Classy lass whose ass you'll never (attempt to) tap again

Dear Dude:

I could see it coming from a mile away. As I stood there, foot cream and Tampax in hand, you raced your way in front of me just to make sure you were in line to purchase your full-calorie grape soda and Hallmark card. There was an old lady who happened to wander over your way, and suddenly it was like watching Britney at the VMAs, where someone with a medication problem was about to fall.

She wobbled over with her brown cane and thick plastic, wedge shoes and took her spot conveniently right in front of you. Then you began yelling at the 107-year-old woman that she was "cutting the line," while she tried to comprehend your screaming and spitting. The old lady probably was having flashbacks to the Civil War as you berated her in front of four other drug-store patrons.

Now granted, you did have a point, as she cut about five waiting people. But you know what? For all we know this may have been her last drug store visit... ever. So why couldn't she pay for her Fiber One 10 minutes before the rest of us? She was about to meet Jesus in 11 minutes!

What is your hurry anyway? Is there some big grape soda convention you're rushing off to? Because when the geriatric woman started to argue back, mentioning something about being first, you kept yelling at her to go back to the end of the line. Wow, I have never met such a chivalrous man as yourself. How the women behind me didn't faint upon hearing the briskness in your voice is beyond me. All I could think about when looking at your left hand was... single?! A man of your strength? It takes a lot to yell at a 4' 2" woman in brown shoes, but round of applause—you did it, man.

LOVE AFFAIR

An island girl and a gourmet grocer

Flynn or Lose

IN 1946, THE DASHING, feckless Errol Flynn lands in Jamaica, where he meets 13-year-old Ida in The Pirate's Daughter. Too white to be truly black, and vice versa, Ida is part-Lebanese, part-Jamaican. She falls madly for Errol and, at 16, gives birth to May. The island's semi-mystical flavors imbue the spirit and the free-flowing life of May, whose mother moves to New York for four years leaving her daughter. Ida returns, now a baroness, married to the somewhat elusive Austrian Karl. This richly coiled tale follows Ida and May, always somewhat warily bonded, and the mix of Jamaican locals and sophisticated ex-pats who populate their social network. Ever-more complex and deep relationships develop for May, and the novel rewards the reader for following what seems like a very long party. Redemptions and connections (though not with Errol!) emerge from the soil of her complicated, exotic landscape.

SPREAD 'EM CARDULLO'S MANY TREATS

Car-delicious

ON THE EVE of its 50th anniversary, Cardullo's remains a treasure trove of foreign-food fanciness, where patrons can step off the Harvard Square sidewalk into Europe. Shoppers, squinting as if at a rare-book library, peruse the elegant tea selections from China, India, England and Russia. There's also PG Tips, a chipper English everyday "cuppa" brand, alongside delicate fruity fennel leaves and dark and smoky Hu Kwa. Chocolates feature the purest cocoa for cooking and slurping, Ghirardelli and Neuhaus, plus little concentrated "nibs" for refined culinary projects. The wines range from inexpensive to cellar-dwelling champagnes. Fun, funny snacks include salty licorice, spicy peanut butter and English standbys like tongue-tingling Marmite. The shop's famously extraordinary deli offers meats and pâté de campagne, which makes a simple gourmet meal on bread with raspberry or fig-and-hazelnut spread. Beautiful, burgeoning cheeses—Roquefort, chèvre—characterize Cardullo's where, of course, you expect truffles. Huge sandwiches combine exotic ingredients, rising to a splendorous caviar-laden "Catherine the Great" for $130. The cookies are bakery-quality, and the seasonal marzipan pigs require no lipstick.

Cardullo's (6 Brattle St., Cambridge, 617-491-8888, cardullos.com) has offered specialty food and wine since 1959.

HOT POCKETS

It happens several times a day—at the T turnstile, in the coffee line, in front of my apartment. I find myself madly digging through my ridiculously heavy, oversized handbag, desperate to find my Charlie Card, change, keys, whatever. So I was thrilled to see designers transform pockets from functional features into fashion statements. Not only do I love the look of these puffy pouches, but they should help keep me moving. RUTH BASLOE

COLUMBUS RESTAURANT GROUP

Purveyors

C'mon Cloveristas I first heard about the Clover from my sister's caffeine-obsessed boyfriend. Once the domain of independent cafes, the single-cup coffeemakers—which had cost $11,000—entered the mainstream when Starbucks acquired the company that builds them. The java giant has since debuted the mythic machine in Seattle and Boston. Essentially operating like a high-tech, hyper-speed French press, the Clover's juice can be enjoyed black and lacks the over-roasted bitterness that usually plagues Starbucks blends. Of course, it comes at a premium. The most splurge-worthy? The El Salvador Pacamara at $3.45 for a tall, with its notes of herb, lemon and dark chocolate. It's serious stuff. LEAH MENNIES

Hooking up in the North End

LESS THAN 24 hours before opening Mercato del Mare, co-owners Keri Cassidy, a former software salesperson, and Liz Ventura, a human resources executive, mastered an important skill. "We learned how to skin a haddock!" Cassidy laughs. Since that day in June when the North End gained a much-needed fish market, the cozy space at 99 Salem St. has attracted a dedicated clientele, including chefs from nearby restaurants.

"Jason [Tucker, executive chef] from Tresca, comes in," Cassidy says. "All of the Mendoza brothers from Monica's, the guys from Antico Forno, Terramia.... But honestly, they can get it cheaper [wholesale] from the distributors. They buy stuff for themselves." Stuff including fresh fish, prepared foods such as lobster rolls and sushi, and other dinner ingredients.

NEWLY OPENED AT 15 West St., Max & Dylans Kitchen Bar is the third restaurant from Brad Dalbeck and chef Chris Damian. Keeping Charlestown's Tavern on the Water and Beacon Hills' Scollay Square successful has made Dalbeck breezily confident in the face of a tenuous economy. "Call us crazy!" he says. With its three levels, two bars and minimalist decor—including artsy, provocative photographs of "people we know"—Max & Dylans is designed to be "a hip, trendy place" with "a fun menu to bounce around," featuring dishes such as Kobe beef meatloaf, flatbread pizzas and five varieties of mac 'n' cheese.

JUST AS THERE WAS A REAL Rachel behind Rachel's Kitchen, there are real folks behind Mike and Patty's, the new sandwich shop sandwiched into the former space of the Bay Village cult object. Mike Fitzhenry and Patty Sinaiko met several years ago while working at Formaggio Kitchen, and while they honor Rachel's Kitchen's rep ("We're sort of the same theme," Patty says), the roster of sandwiches features regional specialties such as Mexican-style tortas and croque monsieurs.

Dining { ERIN BYERS MURRAY WITH JEREMY SEWALL }

A GOOD BET

Casino dining pays off at Alta Strada.

So we're on for dinner at Alta Strada. Do you mind driving?

Erin

FROM: JEREMY SEWALL TO: ERIN BYERS MURRAY
SUBJECT: RE: ALTA STRADA

I don't mind driving. Have you ever ridden that far on the back of a Vespa? Bring a jacket and a helmet. Looking forward to it.

Jeremy

JEREMY SEWALL'S sense of humor had me certain of at least one thing: We'd get along just fine at a casual, Italian restaurant set inside a casino. Jeremy had picked our location because it was the latest project by Michael Schlow, with whom he worked as the opening chef at Great Bay. Now at Lineage in Brookline, Jeremy's also a frequent visitor to the original Alta Strada in Wellesley.

Thankfully our arrival at MGM in Mashantucket, Conn., was in a Nissan, not a Vespa, but it didn't dampen our spirits. What almost did was a slow Monday night—we had almost the whole casino to ourselves. Later, we found out the place was gearing up for a Hannah Montana concert that weekend, so this would be the calm before the storm. More service and attention for us, we figured.

Jeremy greeted Alta Strada's chef Luis Morales warmly (they'd worked at Via Matta together) before we were seated in a red-satin, throne-like banquette overlooking the open kitchen and its roaring brick oven. Though the space felt like a big, empty casino dining room (gaudy chandelier, massive tables), Jeremy noted that it wasn't too over the top. The music veered from Dean Martin crooning "That's Amore" to Kings of Leon. "That's right off Michael's iPod," Jeremy said.

Luis made some menu recommendations, which we happily accepted. Having looked it over, Jeremy noted, "It's priced right. For a casino restaurant, they could easily gouge [us] a little more but they don't." We dove in with an antipasti platter, available with one, three or five items ($8, $21, $34), choosing a creamy, addictive house-made ricotta, spicy green beans with bits of prosciutto, roasted olives with rosemary and orange zest, plus a thinly sliced Tuscan salumi covered in pickled onions and a few slivers of prosciutto. Jeremy loved the presentation: a round, rustic wooden board and a glass filled with slices of crispy, grilled bread.

Inhibited by our long drive home, we couldn't get sloshed—but one glass of wine wouldn't hurt. Despite our and our waiter's best efforts, my Bastianich Tocai ($15) and Jeremy's Foradori Myrto sauvignon blanc

JEREMY'S JACKPOT Sewall scored with the antipasti platter.

($14) were confused not once but twice, causing a minor blip in the otherwise attentive and knowledgeable service. No bother, as we demolished the ethereal brick-oven Margherita pizza ($13). The beautifully textured, pillowy crust stood up to the hearty proportion of melty cheese and crispy basil. "That crust is spectacular," Jeremy noted, while I continued stuffing my face. "It's really easy to screw up that style of pizza, but this is great."

Jeremy's Picks

House-made ricotta with grilled bread

Tuscan salumi with pickled onions

Margherita pizza

Veal sirloin with Tuscan kale and oyster mushrooms

Black-peppercorn, peppermint ice cream

We split an order of chitarra pasta ($32), layered neatly with a few bits of slightly overcooked lobster meat and a spicy sauce. Jeremy's seafood expertise clued me into the lobster; he not only worked as a lobsterman himself but also spent time in the fish kitchen at the Culinary Institute of America. He still travels to Maine weekly to get Lineage's lobsters from his lobstering cousin Mark. At least the pasta, with its square edges, had a nice al dente texture. Next was the veal sirloin, which was perfectly cooked over a pile of Tuscan kale and oyster mushrooms ($42). "That's definitely the most well-rounded dish," Jeremy said.

Faced with a decision on dessert, we picked three, the best a black-peppercorn, peppermint ice cream served alongside tasty scoops of vanilla and chocolate ($7). We also ordered a vanilla bean panna cotta ($8) and Mascarpore-os, chocolate cookies with a mascarpone dipping cream ($9), which won points for pure fun. After a couple of cappuccinos, we made our way back to the Mass. Pike on a windy, darkened road, and I asked Jeremy what he thought of the overall experience. He called it a very "Michael" approach to casual, Italian food. "Would I travel to Foxwoods to go to Alta Strada? No," he said. "But if I'm at Foxwoods, would at I eat at Alta Strada? Definitely." ×××

INSTANT TOWNIE

For Quincy to welcome you, you've got to welcome Quincy.

I'VE ALWAYS ENVIED townies. The townie knows the lay of the land, knows the local players, knows how to get things done. Townies never get traffic tickets because they went to kindergarten with the neighborhood cops—townies themselves. Townies get free HBO and their kids always make the team. Man, I would love to be a townie.

Unfortunately, true townie status has always eluded me, because no matter where I live, I'm always from somewhere else. Growing up in Maine, I couldn't be a townie because I was born in Massachusetts. In Southie, I couldn't be a townie because I grew up in Maine. In Beacon Hill, I wasn't a townie because I'm not descended from Henry James.

So this time around, I'm determined to become a townie in my new home, Quincy. I want to refer to places by names that were outdated 20 years ago. I want to know local slang. I want to be connected, like the guy in my 'hood who's expanding his house about 10 feet—onto a public beach. That's a classic townie move right there.

To get a little behind-the-scenes Quincy knowledge, I recruited my friend Kerry, who lives near Wollaston Beach and writes about food and football for the Boston Herald and ColdHardFootballFacts.com. Kerry, I figured, would have a few insider tips to help me assimilate to my new surroundings. Shortcuts through town, bars that actually clean their taps once a month, things like that. Little did I know that I was soliciting the hard-won knowledge of a de facto townie.

"I've lived all over the place and traveled all over the world," Kerry says. "But I grew up in Quincy, and I live here now, so I guess that makes me a townie." But even within a single town, there are territorial subsets, and Kerry is from Adams Shore, while my new digs are in Hough's Neck, a peninsula that juts out into Boston Harbor between Quincy Bay and Weymouth. "I played youth football for the Hough's Neck Manets, but I only had a green card," Kerry says. "They never issued me citizenship, but I speak Neck-ese fluently."

That's fortunate because, evidently, becoming a townie here will involve linguistic adaptation. "If you want to tell someone to chill out," Kerry says, "you say, 'Easy lips.' And people in

I want to refer to places by names that were outdated 20 years ago. I want to know local slang.

Hough's Neck are called 'Neckers' or 'Neckbirds.' But an outsider can't call a Necker a Neckbird. It's an insult. Only a Necker can call another Necker a Neckbird. Otherwise, they're just plain-old Neckers." This explains a poster I saw that advertised T-shirts bearing slogans such as, "Hough's Neck—one man's trash is another man's treasure." The purveyor's slogan read, "Shirts for Neckers, by Neckers." Back in Maine, a shirt for Neckers would be a turtleneck to cover up hickeys. Which are called "muffler burns." But we mustn't confuse our townie lingo.

Kerry tapped a couple of his Quincy friends for further pointers. Of a sketchy-looking local bar, one of his buddies said, "Stay away for 13 to 15 years, just until you get your feet wet. But if you do happen to go in and see a large-breasted Neckchick named Wanda, tell her she owes me $350 and an apology." And one of Kerry's high-school classmates, Renee, stopped by to welcome me to the neighborhood and divulge some Neck knowledge on who grew up where in several of the houses in my immediate vicinity. Now, when I talk to my neighbor Jimmy, I can casually name-drop Rhonda and Danny and mention how Jimmy's sister Patti-Anne used to hang out with Randi. These are the connections you must memorize to earn a townie card.

In search of more local insight, I talked to my brother-in-law Rick, who lived in Quincy for a few years and was good friends with a Necker. Rick told me that the Hough's Neck Maritime Center—the public dock and boat ramp—used to be the site of Hurley's Boat Rental. "People would rent skiffs there and go flounder fishing, but then they cleaned up the harbor and the flounder went away because there was no more poop to eat off the bottom. Also, there was a drunk who hung out there who'd dive off the top railing of the dock if you gave him a beer." Also, according to Renee, you can buy lobsters right off the boat on weekends down at the Maritime Center—I mean, down at Hurley's, where I used to go flounder fishing before the poop went away.

As a final rite of passage in my crash course, I hit a local dive bar with Kerry. I figured he could interpret and help defuse the situation if I made an inadvertent cultural gaffe, something akin to sticking your chopsticks straight up in your rice in Japan or calling a Necker a Neckbird.

"If you do happen to go in and see a large-breasted Neckchick named Wanda, tell her she owes me $350."

As we sidled up to the bar, Kerry noticed a recent Hough's Neck Manets team photo on the wall. Pondering the fact that there's a street named Manet, and the word appears on the crest emblazoned on the police station, Kerry asked the bartender if he knew what, exactly, a manet is. The bartender had a bit of a local accent, but educated us on the meaning of the ubiquitous Quincy term. As we walked out of the bar, I mentioned, "That's interesting that a manet is a bear." Kerry, looking surprised, replied, "Bear? I thought he said 'beer.' But I guess a bear makes more sense."

I considered going back in to ask the bartender to clarify but decided that would be awkward. Sometimes you just have to say to yourself, "Easy lips." ×××

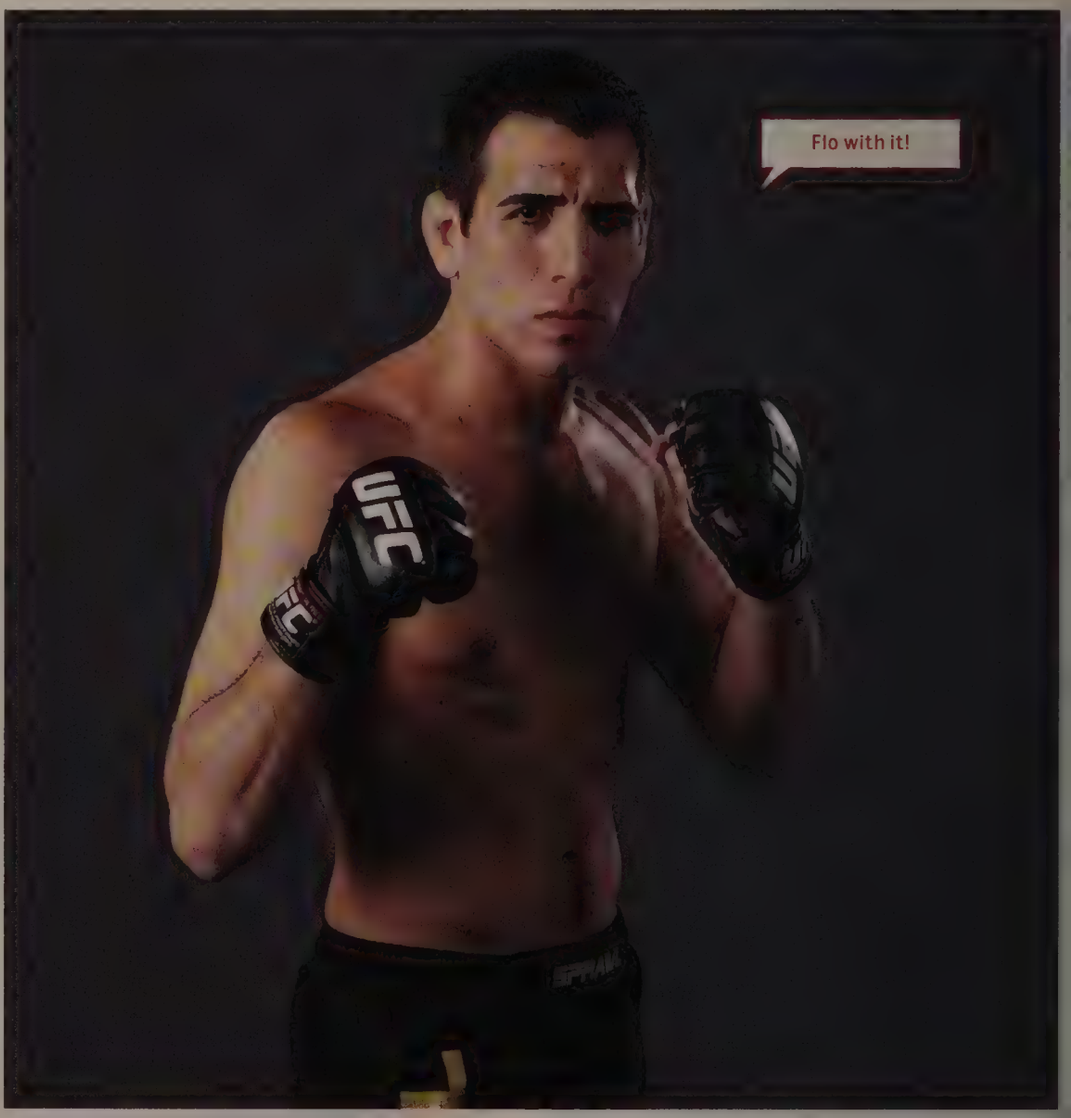
HOOKED

Mixed martial arts claims another fan.



MY FIRST VENTURE into the organized world of one guy beating the brains out of another happened two years ago on my annual trip to Las Vegas. By coincidence, there was an Ultimate Fighting Championship match at my hotel that weekend. I never would've thought the acronym UFC would someday represent a brand, just like the NFL or NBA.

So when a friend was offered tickets to the event, I was skeptical. I had grown up a fight fan, and by that I mean boxing. I wasn't so sure about this kind of sparring. Still, we decided to go.

The funny thing was, the last time I'd been to a match at Mandalay Bay, my Chelsea pal Johnny Ruiz fought a forgettable bout with Kirk Johnson. The arena was only about half full. Not so at the UFC event, where people were clamoring to get inside.

The fight was OK, but I wasn't sold. Fortunately, I also remember meeting a man named Joe Cavallaro, who grew up in Lynnfield, Mass., the town next to mine. Although there as a fan that night, Cavallaro said he had plans to go into the promoting business. I told him to give me a call if the idea ever gained traction. Two years later that call came, and since then I've gotten to know him well.

Ken-Flo is a local up-and-comer. He's trying to erase the stigma.

These days, Cavallaro has created his own company: World Championship Fighting—WCF for short. He has dreams of turning it into a minor league of sorts, one that could serve as a feeder system for an organization like the UFC. His concept: Find fighters. Train them. School them. And send them off to the big time.

Cavallaro's fighting roots date back to his days working with friend and UFC president Dana White. The two met as bellmen at the Boston Harbor Hotel. White nearly went bankrupt pursuing his belief in this once "cult" sport but has since turned it into a multimillion-dollar company.

Cavallaro is approaching his organization with the same go-for-broke attitude. What has made the UFC the NFL of mixed martial arts, called MMA? Television. And that's where Cavallaro plans on taking World Championship Fighting next.

It's a far cry from the UFC. At the same time, it's closer than you think. Cavallaro's company continues to grow in the Northeast as other MMA organizations struggle for survival.

On a recent night, the WCF drew about 3,000 fans to the Shriners Auditorium in Wilmington, Mass. It was quite an evening. There were no superstars, but if the rabid following is any indication, there might be a few soon. Massachusetts, thanks to Cavallaro, has developed into a hotbed of talent, and when the UFC looks for rising stars, it often looks in his direction.

In attendance in Wilmington was Ken Florian, nicknamed "Ken-Flo." He was there checking out the scene. Kenny is a local up-and-comer with a great story. He played Division 1 soccer at Boston College. In addition, he was also a Big East Academic All-Star. Now he's trying to erase the stigma that his sport is barbaric.

"This is not a bare-knuckled, rock 'em–sock 'em sport," Florian said. "A lot of the bouts end by submission and unlike boxing, where fighters have died, MMA is, believe it or not, safer." I never would've believed it, but after watching several fights, I've yet to see a serious injury.

But back to Ken-Flo. On Nov. 15, he'll take the mat for his biggest fight ever in, of course, Las Vegas. He's facing Joe Stevenson at the MGM Grand Arena, and although it's not Hagler and Hearns—at least not yet—I'm still very interested. In fact, I'll be watching. I'm hooked. ***

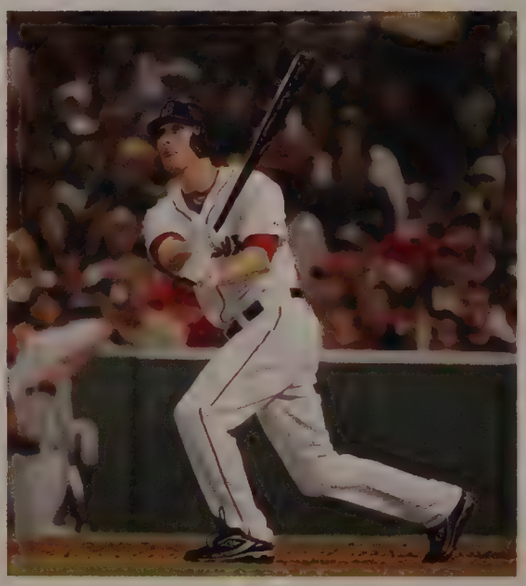
The School of Sports { RICH LEVINE }

ON THE PLAYOFFS, THE PRESEASON, MAYO AND ECK

5 RED SOX QUESTIONS...

...TO BE ANSWERED BY SEASON'S END.



Was Bay worth it?
And with the first pitch of the postseason, all that Jason Bay accomplished since joining the Sox was erased. Our faith in Bay—and, really, all of Canada—rests solely in the now. If he produces, who cares what that "pumpkin pie haircutted" freak in L.A.'s doing? But if not, we'll be stalking Dodger box scores like they're an ex-girlfriend's Facebook page.

Does Lester have "it"?
There are a lot of good pitchers in the majors, but the great ones—with the exception of Roger Clemens—make their marks in the playoffs. Lester is good. We know that much. But does he have the extra Beckett/Schilling gear that makes the good ones great?

Hall of Fame for Francona?
Five years ago, he was essentially hired to appease Curt Schilling, but if Terry Francona wins his third title—which only eight managers have ever done—doesn't he deserve some consideration for the Hall? He'd have to stick around a little longer, but it'd be hard for even the crustiest of voters to deny that kind of greatness—as long as his bronze HOF bust shows him with a nice, fat chew of tobacco.

Is Tek done in Boston?
We assume that free-agent-to-be Jason Varitek wants to stay in Boston, but we also know that his agent, Scott Boras, is certifiably insane. If El Capitan picks up a few choice hits in the postseason, Boras might have more to work with, and that's not necessarily a good thing. Giving Scott Boras leverage is like giving a crate of Roman candles to a 13-year-old pyro.

Who's King of the Closers?
Outside of saves and walks, Jonathan Papelbon and Francisco Rodriguez had almost identical numbers in '08. In the ALDS, each man will have a chance to earn bragging rights for 2009. But something tells us that K-Rod will find a way to celebrate himself, regardless of the outcome.

4 DATES TO WATCH

10/10 What's the more bizarre potential playoff development: the Sox opening up the ALCS tonight at Tropicana Field, or Boston beating the Rays and facing off against Manny, Nomar, D-Lowe and Torre in the World Series?

10/11 The Celtics take on the Rockets in a preseason game in Manchester, N.H. Oct. 12 headline: "Ron Artest permanently expelled from New Hampshire after challenging entire state, all of Maine and half of Vermont to a bare-knuckle boxing match."

10/12 The Pats travel to San Diego for the NFL's annual LT Excuse Game. "They play dirty" and "My big toe still hurts" are the early favorites. "They have no respect for the game" was recently taken off the board.

10/20 The Bruins already can't catch a break in '08. Tonight's home opener against the Penguins is sure to be overshadowed by the Pats/Broncos Monday-night showdown—but maybe there's a way to convince Tony Kornheiser to broadcast the Bruins game instead?

SEND FEEDBACK TO RICH@IMPROPER.COM AND READ MORE AT COMCASTSPORTSNET.COM.

1 ONE WORD ON ECK

Dennis Eckersley played in Boston very early in his career, before moving on to bigger and better things. Seems like it won't be long before he leaves us on his broadcasting dust as well—the man just knows how to break down a game. But if 1999 was any indication, let's hope he spares Boston another moonlight rendezvous.

2 EARLY PATRIOTS' RETURNS

Hold the bad pun... It's been 12 years since we've been as excited about a Patriots rookie as we are about Jerod Mayo. Back in 1996, it was Terry Glenn setting Foxborough on fire, but while she obviously fizzled in New England, Mayo's not going anywhere. Sometimes you can just tell when a guy's born to be a Patriot.

We were completely sober while writing this... We have faith in Randy Moss. Of course, as a player, but also as a leader. At 31 years old, we think he's turned a corner; he's matured. Perhaps coincidentally, Moss also has a lot on the line this year in terms of legacy. Was that touchdown record merely a product of Brady? Is he anything without his QB?

3 Deep Thoughts

BY CELTICS HOPEFUL DARIUS MILES

On getting another chance... "I knew I'd play again, but I was hoping not to end up on a team that was rebuilding and losing a lot of games. But for Danny to give me the chance to play on a team like this, it's a blessing."

On his new teammates... "I've known Sam [Cassell] forever. We never played together, but we've had a lot of wars together. Me, Kevin, Sam, Paul, Ray, we had a lot of wars... a lot of games where we went at each other. It's great to be on their side."

On his famous "headband fist pump"... "I haven't decided if I'm gonna do it yet. You know, I don't really want to make it anything about the individual, but maybe I'll run it by Doc and if he's cool, maybe I'll do it."

STELLA ARTOIS

Perfection HAS ITS PLACE

A perfectly poured Stella Artois is the Gold Standard of Belgian beer.

Step One THE PURIFICATION

The bartender selects the signature glass for the beer being poured. The glass is scrubbed in a cool-water bath, preferably with a mild detergent. It's then rinsed with cold water to chill the glass.

Step Two THE SACRIFICE

The tap is opened in one swift motion to let the first burst of foam flow away. It must never enter the glass, thus ensuring every drop of beer is fresh.

Step Three THE LIQUID ALCHEMY

The glass is held at a 45-degree angle to create the perfect balance of liquid to foam.

Step Four THE HEAD

The head is created by straightening and lowering the glass. The foam is visually appealing and releases the beer's aroma.

Step Five THE REMOVAL

The bartender closes the tap in one quick action and moves the glass away from the faucet to ensure no drops spoil the perfect head.

Step Six THE BEHEADING

While the beer is flowing over the edge of the glass, the bartender cuts the head gently with a head cutter at a 45-degree angle. This eliminates the larger bubbles that burst easily and accelerate the dissipation of the head.

Step Seven THE JUDGMENT

The bartender now stands in judgment. The beer's head should be two fingers thick.

Step Eight THE CLEANSING

The bartender then rinses the bottom and sides of the glass. This keeps the glass clean and cool and makes it comfortable to hold.

Step Nine THE BESTOWAL

Soroff On CHESTER FRENCH

The Ivy League duo on nudity, rock-star excess and their fixation with Gil Mantera's Party Dream

POP SENSATION CHESTER FRENCH consists of Harvard grads Maxwell Drummey and D.A. Wallach. Having named their band after sculptor Daniel Chester French, who designed the John Harvard statue in the Yard, Boston-bred Drummey and Milwaukee-raised Wallach started performing together in college and quickly developed a campus following. The 23-year-olds landed a record deal when hip-hop giant Pharrell Williams signed them to his Star Trak/Interscope label (Kanye West also made an offer). This year, Rolling Stone called the band "An Artist to Watch," and Spin magazine featured them in its "Who's Next '08" roundup of rising talent. Their song "She Loves Everybody" was featured on the HBO series Entourage. In August, Drummey married Peaches Geldof. He currently lives in New York, while Wallach lives in Milwaukee.

Jonathan Soroff: What are the odds that two Harvard geeks become pop stars?

Max Drummey: One in five. It's a misconception that Harvard is full of geeks. It's actually the coolest place on earth. We account for 20 percent of the geeks who ever attended Harvard.

So who's the better looking of the two of you?
D.A. Wallach: Obviously me. But I'd expect Max to say the same thing. We're huge narcissists.

That would explain why you've been all over the European fashion magazines.
DAW: Exactly. That was a weird one. We went out to a junkyard in L.A., a car graveyard, and they put us in crazy clothes. It started torrentially downpouring, and all the photography people freaked out because the very expensive clothing was getting wet. They called the shoot off and we left, but we still managed to get four pictures out of it.

Are you guys clotheshorses?
MD: We wear clothes.

I was under the impression that you were the naked pop duo Chester French.
DAW: Just on stage.
MD: I don't even get naked to have sex.

What did your Harvard education get you?
MD: Older.

Everyone tries to classify your music.
DAW: It can't be done. No way.
MD: I'm not even sure we're musicians.

Anyone who plays the theremin has to be a musician.
MD: As somebody who plays the theremin, I respectfully disagree.

Now that you're stars, what's your best sex, drugs and rock 'n' roll story?
DAW: I'm back home in Wisconsin, and I went to a Mothers Against Drunk Driving meeting last night. So that has something to do with drugs and alcohol, right?

Is it scary to be the Next Big Thing?
DAW: No, it's great. Our goal has always been to have as many people as possible hear our stuff and to not have day jobs besides music. So right now we're closer to having that be a reality than we were three years ago.

Do either of you have day jobs?
MD: Just for fun. I work part-time as a carpenter and wood carver, and I was a waiter at Denny's for a while. That didn't last too long, because I was eating too many Grand Slams and losing my physique. I had this other job for a while, panhandling. Some people don't think it's a job, but it's work.

Did you ever busk in Harvard Square?
DAW: We did. The summer after our freshman year we created a little EP, and we sold it on the street. If people were reluctant to buy it, we'd offer to play them something live, with the agreement that if they liked our performance, they'd buy the CD for five bucks.

So exactly how much weed do you smoke?
MD: Y'know, look, dude. None. Ever. I'm offended by this question.

What's the biggest indulgence you've bought since hitting the big time?
MD: I bought an indulgence for $300 from the Archdiocese of Boston, and I've been assured a place in heaven. It's fantastic.

Who knew they were so cheap these days.
MD: I know. And that's adjusted for inflation.
DAW: I bought a mobile home. A 72-foot luxury liner. Working toilet that never has to be emptied. It turns waste into edible brownies. It's got a urine purifier. It's totally tricked out.

So why do all the hip-hop stars love you?
DAW: They find it interesting that we're the first artists to wear whiteface all the time, publicly.

Top three songs on your iPod?
MD: The only thing I listen to is Gil Mantera's Party Dream. They're the only band worth listening to.
DAW: I've got Tiny Tim's greatest hits, and I just keep that spinning.

Anything you disagree on?
MD: Nothing except who's more beautiful.

So how autobiographical are your songs?
MD: They're autobibliographical.

So is "She Loves Everybody" about a specific woman?
MD: I don't think it says anywhere in the song that she's specifically human.

So you could be talking about a dog?
DAW: Could be.

Most overrated band?
MD: Gil Mantera's Party Dream.

You seem a little fixated.
MD: Well, if you ask what we do, I'll just say it's derivative of Gil Mantera's Party Dream.

I smell a Grammy. How will you split it?
MD: If I were to get one, it would be such an injustice that it didn't go to Gil Mantera's Party Dream, I'd give it to them.

Well, you're a gentleman and a scholar.
MD: You know who else is? Gil Mantera. ✖✖✖

NOISE MAKERS

By PAUL ROBICHEAU Illustrations by ALEX FAMLIN

The growth of the Internet and the decline of major labels have leveled the playing field for bands everywhere—and certainly on the busy Boston music scene. It's hard to make a buck (even an underground icon like Thalia Zedek needs a day job), but groups can create their own opportunities near and far, spreading their music through MySpace and YouTube, as well as licensing deals, downloads and CDs. Whether these artists are indie-folk, hard rock or synth-pop, surprise upstarts or respected veterans who tour the world, they all pass through the local clubs. Check out these 10 acts currently making noise around town.

THE TOOTHACHES

GLOCKENSPIEL, $30. UKULELE, $30. Casio keyboard, $35. For the Toothaches, assembling novel instruments was the cheap and (relatively) easy part. "We found the Casio on Craigslist and bought it from a woman in a Kmart parking lot in Saugus," Rose Blakelock says. "She was afraid to have us come to her house."

Finding the right groove took more time. The group began in 2006 as an acoustic trio with Zimmy Ayer on guitar and Blakelock and Monica Hubbell trading items from their secondhand arsenal, playing spaces like the Whitehaus in Jamaica Plain. All three sang and clapped hands in lieu of drums. "It was folky," Blakelock says, "but we were always drunk when we played, so it was kind of rock 'n' roll."

It became more rock 'n' roll after bassist Andrew Zizik and drummer Johnny Jannetty joined a year ago, sounding at times like a '60s girl group ("If the Marvelettes got synthesizers and did Ecstacy," Ayer offers) or the early B-52s. Blakelock says they want to break from the indie-pop crowd, where "people just branded us as twee or cutesy."

Now fans are dancing to the quintet's shifting, sugar-rush rhythms and chiming in on the catchy, overlapping choruses. "I feel like bands have forgotten the idea of putting on a show and engaging the audience," says Blakelock, whose group is working on a new CD.

She and Ayer, who sport identical tooth tattoos on their forearms ("Our friendship bracelet," Blakelock explains), just moved to Brooklyn, with Hubbell soon to follow. But Emerson students Zizik and Jannetty are keeping the band's foothold in Boston for a while. "Hopefully the Toothaches will last forever and take over the world," she says, "but even if they don't… 'Oh my gosh, I got this stupid band tattoo!'"

PASSION PIT

MICHAEL ANGELAKOS AGREES THAT '80s new wave/disco musicians such as the Human League and Giorgio Moroder inform his synth-based outfit Passion Pit. "I found that really seductive," Angelakos says. "It hit me harder than distorted guitars." But his biggest influence? English eccentric Kate Bush. "Especially the usage of her voice," he says. "She creates characters."

With his high-powered falsetto, singer/keyboardist Angelakos is creating characters of his own—and a sudden career move that has taken off. "It hasn't even been a year since our first show," he says of his band, formed after he made Chunk of Change with a music computer program as a Valentine's Day gift for his girlfriend.

"The recording was very, very spontaneous," Angelakos says of the six-song disc, constructed with synthesizer sounds cobbled from MP3s. "It's so loud and poorly recorded. It wasn't intended for anyone but my friends and, of course, my girlfriend. It's very funny to see what it's come to."

Luckily, some of his friends were Berklee music-synthesis majors who convinced him they should flesh out his quirky, danceable tunes for the stage. "It didn't need to sound like the record," he says of arrangements forged with a rhythm section and synthesizer-mates Ian Hultquist and Ayad Al Adhamy. "It's a completely different experience."

Now Passion Pit is one of Boston's hottest live bands. And Angelakos, on leave from studying radio and film at Emerson, is back in the studio, pursuing his newfound songwriting passion to make a full-length follow-up. "It's going to be lots of bells, lots of experimental recordings," he says. "It'll be a really great pop record."

MARISSA NADLER

SHY BY NATURE AND HAUNTING in sound, singer/songwriter Marissa Nadler views her musical self as an alter ego. "The idea that I'm a performer is bizarre to me," Nadler admits. "It feels like I take a year off my life every time I get onstage. There's anxiety before, during and after."

Performing has grown somewhat easier as the Needham native tours solo through the U.S., Europe and Australia as a revered dream-folk artist. And she'll have company in the months ahead to help cushion any jitters.

Nadler's fourth album, due in January, explores more band-oriented textures, with guitarist Myles Baer (who'll also join her at upcoming gigs), keyboardist Farmer Dave Scher and Blonde Redhead drummer Simone Pace. The CD should build on 2007's atmospheric Songs III: Bird on the Water, in which Nadler's enchanting soprano and acoustic fingerpicking were subtly augmented by Philadelphia band the Espers.

"It's got a little more punch and it's more of an electric record, but there are similar stylings," Nadler says of the next disc. "But it's still pretty creepy, sad, soft music." She grew up listening to atmospheric pop bands like Belly and Mazzy Star but preferred to work as a solo songwriter and originally pursued painting at the Rhode Island School of Design. "It took a long time to get the confidence up. With art, I was trained. But with music, I was more of an outsider. It didn't become serious until I realized that maybe I wasn't that horrible as a singer.

"A lot of what makes a good painting makes a good song," continues Nadler, who moved back to Boston last year after stints in Providence and New York. "My writing is very visual and descriptive, because that's how I see the world."

KETMAN

COLLABORATION ISN'T THE FIRST thing that hard-rock trios usually discuss. But the schizoid, alt-punk combustion engine known as Ketman is more than the sum of its parts.

"The more collaborative the project got, the better it was," says guitarist/singer Eric Penna, who found the ideal match in bassist-singer Joe Marrett and drummer Mora Precarious. "The melody seems to lie in the interplay of instruments, not just a guitar riff or bass line. It became a third thing when we played together.

"It became more aggressive," Penna adds, while noting, "We maintain a varied sound that can turn in any direction. You couldn't say Ketman can't put out a lounge-jazz song." There's no lounge jazz on Ketman's bullish new CD El Toro, named after its lead track, which features Spanish-flavored trumpet from Marrett's Hallelujah the Hills bandmate Brian Rutledge. But the disc artfully slices through brutal changeups that echo '80s post-punk inspirations like Wire and Mission of Burma.

The group's "common weird language," as Marrett calls it, extends to collage-like lyrics that he and Penna often cowrite. "We'll both be thinking about the same feeling for a song," Penna says. "There'll be something about it that made the two of us think 'Carnival!'"

MEAN CREEK

WHEN THE GUITAR TWOSOME of Chris Keene and Aurore Ounjian sing together, their voices bend and blend into a distinct entity of its own. "It's a connected thing," says Ounjian, who met Keene several years ago at Watertown High School, then began making music with him after graduation. "It almost feels like one voice."

They honed that stark connection as a folk-styled duo—à la Bob Dylan and Joan Baez or Richard and Mimi Fariña—before hooking up with a rock-hardy rhythm section to bridge the gap between Tom Petty and the Arcade Fire. "As a duo, we weren't really satisfied," says Ounjian, who had moved with Keene to New York City, where they performed under the simple name Chris & Aurore. "It was all limited to two acoustic guitars and a certain type of sound."

They plugged back into the Boston scene and finally struck the right combination with hard-chopping drummer Mikey Holland and new bassist Erik Wormwood. And when Ounjian injects a high, lonesome harmonica break without missing a beat on guitar, it adds another layer of what she calls "a big part of the song, like a guitar solo or a chorus."

In contrast to the often upbeat feel of the music, however, Mean Creek also casts a downbeat shadow, partly through lyrics about people's everyday travails in the trenches. "That's how the words make me feel," says Keene, whose band is ready to follow its excellent 2007 disc, Around the Bend, with a new collection next year. "I find it hard to write a meaningful song about a happy subject."

KID:NAP:KIN

DAN ELLIS CAN CLEARLY OUTLINE the arc of the tragic relationship story framing Hush Now..., the full-length debut from his edgy rock trio KID:NAP:KIN. It starts with a suicide on the opening track, then rewinds to the first meeting, trust issues, infidelity, realization and murder.

"It's set like a horror-movie script, which is really just a metaphor for ending a relationship on a bad note," singer/guitarist Ellis says. "I like things that are theatrical and exciting and fun for me to write. There are enough bands out there that write very literally."

The same goes for KID:NAP:KIN's music, an aggressive, often dizzying, rush that falls between a harshed-up Incubus and a stripped-down Mars Volta. It's full of dynamic precision and stylistic twists that draw on both formal training and open-mindedness. Ellis, drummer Patrick Hanlin and bassist Jamila Weaver all graduated in 2006 from Berklee, which he cites for the "jazzy, bluesy feel" they bring to hard rock.

"We take all of those influences and try to put them into coherent rock songs," Ellis explains. "I think it's important that musicians are well-rounded, because they can take influences from every genre." The group went for more of an organic, chill vibe on the CD than on its metallic first EP. Hush Now... was produced by Alien Ant Farm drummer Mike Cosgrove, whose grandfather Richard even lent two spoken-word interludes for a Tom Waits–like touch.

Otherwise, Ellis not only handles the vocals but also soars, drawing comparisons to the late, great Jeff Buckley. It's hard to believe that he and Hanlin initially auditioned 130 singers. "I never wanted to be frontman," Ellis says, modestly adding, "Then I just decided to try."

FREEZEPOP

LIZ ENTHUSIASM quickly notes the obvious connection when asked to describe her tongue-in-cheek combo Freezepop. "It's fun electro-pop that most people would know from video games," says the cool-voiced singer and designer, whose real name is Jussi Gamache. "That's our entryway into most people's consciousness."

Indeed, when you license songs for Guitar Hero II ("Less Talk More Rokk") and Rock Band ("Brainpower"), it's quite an entryway—a quantum leap from earlier placements in FreQuency and Karaoke Revolution. "Those were music-based, but they were played by gamers as opposed to casual gamers," Gamache says. "Everybody plays Guitar Hero and Rock Band."

It's also pretty wild to imagine gamers rocking out on virtual guitars to poppy synthesizer parts. "We're definitely broadening the definition of rock," she says.

Freezepop has broadened its own definition over nine years and about as many records. Kasson Crooker, calling himself the Duke of Pannekoeken, initially launched a dance act with his hand-sized Yamaha QY-70 sequencer and a vocoder to make Gamache's vocals sound robotic, while Sean Drinkwater (aka the Other Sean T. Drinkwater) doubled on synthesizers.

"It was a conscious choice on our part to keep things super-simple," Gamache says. "Now the boys have expanded their palette of options." Perhaps the best advancement came in portable "keytars" with wireless MIDI hookups to other synthesizers. "Getting keytars was pretty important to our live shows," she says. "Now the keytars don't even have wires, so [the guys] can go out into the crowd."

This creates another video-game ambition for the band: "We're keeping our fingers crossed for Keytar Hero."

THALIA ZEDEK BAND

THALIA ZEDEK IS CERTAINLY NO newcomer, having made her mark in the pioneering '80s Boston bands Dangerous Birds and Uzi (as well as New York's Live Skull) before devoting most of the '90s to the more bluesy Come, cofronted by guitarist Chris Brokaw. Not that history matters much to the young clubgoers who catch her latest incarnation on the circuit.

"That's what I hope for," Zedek says of newfound fans who burrow into her dark ruminations on personal and political grist. "The past is the past. This is what I'm doing now."

The Thalia Zedek Band is an extension of the trio she has fronted as a solo artist in recent years. "I thought we'd pushed as far as we could with three of us," she says. "You always want to expand on what you're doing and not have things become formulaic." So Zedek augmented violist David Curry and drummer Daniel Coughlin with bassist Winston Braman (formerly of both Consonant and Fuzzy) and onetime Victory at Sea pianist Mel Lederman, a guest on previous Zedek discs.

"It's kind of freeing, and, as a singer, I have that background to work against," says Zedek, currently touring behind Liars and Prayers, her first outing with the band.

Her world-weary voice still dominates, tugging against the landscape with quietly seething emotion. Zedek says she's trying to be more down-to-earth and less impressionistic in her writing. Her new CD ranges from songs about friends who have moved on to "Begin to Exhume," where she laments the Bush administration's Iraq policies, singing, "Show us the body who you're protecting us from / You buried it in lies."

"I don't know a lot of the time where the lyrics come from," she admits. "I just know what I'm thinking about."

PARKER HOUSE AND THEORY

PARKER HOUSE AND THEORY MAY have left the wrong impression by nabbing a 2006 Boston Music Award as best funk/jam band. The only thing the polished, concisely tuneful quintet jams onstage is variety, but the group's personality and versatility gets lost on its slickly crafted new album Automatic Stranger.

"It's hard to translate that personality because a lot of it is visual, with interpersonal relationships and things we do onstage that involve the audience," singer/guitarist Eric-jon Tasker explains. "It's hard to put that on a record."

That hasn't stopped Parker House and Theory (whose members decline to reveal the source of the cumbersome name) from becoming one of the city's most popular acts, packing the Paradise and touring the Midwest with O.A.R. Not bad for five Emerson alumni who all studied film or acting.

"Instead of chasing one pipe dream, I jumped to another," jokes lead guitarist Carlos Foglia, who initially launched an acoustic duo with Tasker in 1999. "I figured being an actor was too lucrative, so I'd try to be a musician."

Band members play their roles well—and have expanded on them. Drummer Marcos Valles, keyboardist Andy Wesby (who also plays a zesty harmonica) and bassist Colin Lewis get free reign as singer/songwriters. Valles and Wesby shone in lead vocal turns at a recent Paradise show. Valles even played guitar in an unplugged turn with Tasker and Wesby, while a horn section seamlessly underscored other songs.

"People don't realize how much we rehearse and put into this," Foglia says. "We're all perfectionists."

THE DECEMBER SOUND

THE DECEMBER SOUND TENDS to wash over listeners like a massive attack—and not just with its loud, droning music. Onstage, the psychedelic rock band usually pours it on with flashing lights and optical projections. "We want to stimulate all the senses," guitarist/singer Zack Sarzana says, "to make it exciting on a lot of different levels, with film and sound and vibration.

"Layering is a big part of what we do," adds Sarzana, a North End native who moved to Brooklyn in 2005. Keyboardist/guitarist Jimmy Rossi (who helps with the visuals), bassist Cat Crowley and drummer Drew Beaverson are still in Boston, where the band records half its music in its practice room.

Sarzana records the rest alone in his home studio, building dense, dislocated ideas into songscapes both focused and bristling, as on the band's eponymous 2007 debut. "It's basically whatever works," he says, embracing a raw, do-it-yourself approach that stresses "initial magic" over precision. "I like stuff that sounds kind of broken."

Though he accepts comparisons to the Jesus and Mary Chain or early Black Rebel Motorcycle Club, Sarzana also cites such influences as the Italian pop he grew up with (his grandfather was also a big-band winds virtuoso), plus film and hip-hop avatars Public Enemy. "They had noisy blips that sounded like alarms. That was their white noise to the Mary Chain's feedback. There was something unsettling to it."

Sarzana called his group December, but a similarly titled metal band forced him to lengthen the name. "It's like a wintry, dark sound," he reasons, "a crash in the middle of nowhere. You don't know what it is, but you're trying to find out."

MIDLIFE MUSIC CRISIS

A wannabe drummer plays rock god.

By Ezra Dyer Photographs by Matt Teuten

"ONE-TWO-THREE-FOUR, one-two-three-four—give me that beat with the right hand on the cymbal," Nat Mugavero says, as I tentatively sit down at the drums for my first lesson. I've always harbored the notion that I might be good at them, sort of how I might have latent proficiency at taxidermy or NASCAR racing. Since I've never tried any of those things, I've never had to discount the possibility. But in the case of the drums, time is running out. I'm 30, all my friends have babies and my new house is right at the intersection of Grown-Up Avenue and Lame Street. If I don't learn the drums now, the next thing you know, I'll be mowing my lawn or getting a prostate exam saying, "Damn! I could've been a rock god!"

Rob Buttomer schools his fledgling student.

I PLAN TO USE TWO INSTRUCTORS TO FIND out whether I'm the next John Bonham or a stick-wielding hack with less rhythm than a roiling bag of hot popcorn. The first, Nat, comes recommended from several of the hep cats at the Beehive in the South End, among them music director Bruce Ferrara, who tells me, "Nat has probably the most highly refined sensibility and understanding of the essence of music [of] anyone I've met. It's like he gives you permission to know what you know." In other words, Nat—despite having played with guys like Coleman Hawkins and Sonny Stitt—isn't a disdainful master, treating you like a pimple on the butt of music. He's sympathetic to my plight, which is good, because I quit on music easily. I played the trombone for about two weeks in fifth grade before deciding it wasn't gonna work out. To motivate my adult self, I've agreed to perform onstage at the Beehive next month.

Seated at the drum kit in Nat's basement in Lawrence, I grip the sticks and softly tap the cymbal, imitating the cadence as he counts along with me. One-two-three-four, one-two-three-four. "That's it! You've got it!" he declares with a mixture of encouragement tinged with relief. Sweet! I'm outta here. I knew I'd kick ass at this. But wait—it turns out there's more I'll need to learn before I show my chops at the Beehive. "What you're doing there is great. You've got that naturally," Nat says. "But when you're playing, that'll work for about three seconds, and then the band will go, 'OK, what now?'" Um, good question.

You've probably tried, at some point in your life, to pat your head and rub your belly simultaneously. I can do that, which, in addition to my beat-slaying, steering-wheel–finger-tapping solos, is one of the reasons I assumed I could play the drums: There's some independence in my motor skills. But a better litmus test of drumming potential would be to try patting your head twice as fast as you're rubbing your belly while jumping rope double-time with your left foot and playing with a helium-filled hacky sack with your right. You dig? You'd better, because that's another aspect of drums—using the phrase "dig."

Nat's easygoing attitude makes it easier when I completely botch my next assignment: keep time with the right hand while hitting the left drum on the two and four beats, and using my right foot on the kick drum for the one and three beats. We're leaving the left foot out of the picture for now, which is good, because even with this relatively simple task, I produce a sound akin to a set of drums falling down a spiral staircase. I suppose I'm naive, but I figured I'd be able to sit right down and at least play "Take the Money and Run." I underestimated your mystery and nuance, drums.

I figured I'd be able to sit right down and at least play "Take the Money and Run." I underestimated your mystery and nuance, drums.

After slowing the beat to something like Lance Armstrong's resting pulse, I'm able to train my left hand, right hand and right foot to come together for a coherent sound. It's like looking at one of those old Magic Eye prints—once your brain unlocks its ingrained habit of synchronizing your limbs, the pattern jumps out and you're able to see the dragon (or in this case, keep independent beats with your arms and legs). At one point, Nat even hops on a piano in the corner and jams along with me. I'm doing this. But then I get home and, using the sticks Nat gave me, try to replicate the simple beat on a pair of pillows on my coffee table. Sometimes I get it, and sometimes I don't. Ice cubes fill my gut as I wonder how much I'll have to practice to pull this off.

My subsequent lessons come from my second mentor, Rob Buttomer. Rob's been playing drums for 25 years and has regular gigs all around Boston. After a quick adjustment to his drum set in Quincy, which is oriented for his left-handed, eight-year-old son, I settle in and show him my basic moves, honed on the pillows in my living room. Satisfied that there's at least a tiny amount of drum information taking root in my brain, Rob seeks to build on what Nat's already taught me. He makes me memorize the names of all the drums and cymbals, and periodically quizzes me. He shows me a couple different grips for the sticks. He gets my left foot working with my left hand, rocking the high-hat cymbal on the twos and fours. And then he teaches me my next and, given the time constraints, only trick: the fill.

The fill, for you non-drummers, is the part in a song where the drummer rips off some wicked beats on the tom-toms and maybe the snare and kick drum, ending with an emphatic whack on the crash cymbal before segueing back into the original beat. The challenge of the fill is to noodle around, hitting all these different drums and generally rocking people's faces off, while still mentally keeping track of that implied "One-two-three-four." Lucky for me, it's possible to hammer out a cool-sounding fill without throwing in a drum roll or spinning around in your seat or lighting your sticks on fire, although doing any of those things is, of course, awesome. "Sometimes it's smart to take the KISS approach," Rob tells me. As the blank look on my face communicates that I don't know what Gene Simmons has to do with my drum lesson, Rob adds, "'Keep it simple, stupid.'"

Maybe you'll do four measures of the regular beat and then two measures of fill. Maybe you'll go two-to-one. But whatever you do, you've got to keep counting so that you come back to the beat at the proper time. Drums, it turns out, require a lot of math. I keep trying the fill and failing. I can't seem to come back at the right time, or my fill sounds like faulty fireworks going off, or I can't unleash myself when Rob signals me to let it rip. I'm stuck in the beat. I didn't even know that could happen. Toward the end of my lesson, Rob's son grabs a seat at the drums and lays down a funky beat, expertly working the high-hat for that cool "swish-swish" cymbal sound. I don't know whether I should be encouraged that an eight-year-old can do this or discouraged because an eight-year-old is obviously several years ahead of me. I take solace in the fact that I'd surely ruin this kid at basketball and probably Scrabble.

Once again, I head home and practice, wondering if my neighbors can see me through my living-room window. Nothing to see here! Just a guy pounding pillows with drumsticks and occasionally screaming obscenities. Relentlessly, my date with the live stage approaches. With hours to go until my performance of Miles Davis' "Freddie Freeloader" onstage with actual musicians, I sit on my couch frantically practicing while watching football. I was supposed to download "Freddie Freeloader" and listen to it, but I avoided doing so on the grounds that I'd probably only confuse myself. If, after all, I only know how to do a couple things, how will it help to listen to something that's outside my abilities? I'm a stolid practitioner of the KISS method.

When I arrive at the Beehive, I'm relieved to see two drum sets on the stage. Nat's here, setting up, and he explains that we'll play the song together, and I'm going to look to him to figure out when to go off on my own and when to stay in the background. On one hand, it's great that Nat's around to make sure I don't wander off into some random beat known only to me, leaving the other musicians to play "Freddie Freeloader" while "Jungle Boogie" erupts behind them. On the other hand, it's a big jump from hitting pillows in your living room to knowing when to assert yourself in a five-person band while playing live in front of a nightclub audience. Also, a spotlight is aimed directly on my drum set. Great. But I have no choice in the matter now. One-two-three-four, and we're into it. I'm drumming.

For a split second, I panic, and all I can make my body do is tap out the beat with my right hand on the ride cymbal. But slowly, I convince my right foot to join the band on the kick drum, then my left foot on the high-hat and my left hand on the tom-tom. I'm doing it. I look over at Nat, to my right, and he nods approvingly. In my first lesson, Nat instructed me to experiment with "variations of leaving out"—in other words, dropping certain components from my beat and then coming back to them. Right now, onstage, I begin doing that, but not intentionally. I just can't seem to keep everything going in time, so the moment I feel like I'm about to spaz out on, say, the kick drum, I simply abandon it until I can count it back in on the proper beat. I hope this comes off as jazzy.

As the song progresses, I never abandon the ride cymbal, but neither do I jump in with a fill in the spaces where Nat looks over and seems to subsume his own drumming, as if to tell me to go for it. I feel like I'd be doing the wrong thing at the wrong time, ripping out a clumsy solo while the rest of the band plays, literally, to the beat of a different drummer. So I keep it cool, keep it classy, keep it extremely basic. I glance out at the audience and absorb a little bit of what it must be like to be a real performer, with expectant eyeballs focused on your every move. It's a rush, and it'd probably be more of a fun rush—rather than the nervous kind—if I had the confidence of really knowing what I was doing.

A few minutes after we start, I can feel the song winding down to its conclusion. Now is my chance. I don't know much about what I'm doing, but I do know that it's good to end a song with some emphatic drums, capped with a smash of the cymbals. Taking Nat's cue, I try to hit every drum in front of me with a crescendo of determination before winding up for the final flourish, a conclusive rap on the crash cymbal. The audience applauds, and I soak it in. Overall, my chops held up, but right at the end I hit the ride cymbal, with its more dampened sound, instead of the riotously noisy crash cymbal. The crowd didn't seem to notice the gaffe, but then they're not drummers. ***

BODEGA CO-OWNER OLIVER MAK REVEALS HIS SECRET STYLE.

By Amanda Knorr Photographs by Michael Piazza

Designer, DJ and skateboarder Oliver Mak knows how important exclusivity is to the fashion-obsessed. It's the whole basis of Bodega, his retail store and sneaker sanctuary disguised as a neighborhood minimart. The 29-year-old co-owner spends his days scouring the net for new brands, sketching concepts for major companies like Nike and updating his merchandise. But when your job is finding unique products for everyone else, how do you differentiate your own look? Somehow it's not a problem for Mak. We asked him to break down his signature style, which draws inspiration from vintage apparel, the music industry and his peers.

Improper Bostonian: How would you describe your look?
Oliver Mak: An amalgamation of classic youth movements crossed with underqualified single dad.

Where do you shop in town?
Bodega and Bobby from Boston.

Where do you shop outside the city?
Barracuda and Union in L.A., and Turntable Lab in New York City and L.A.

What's your go-to getup?
Vans Snakeskin Sk8-hi's that weren't produced (30 samples made) or Bodega Adidas ZX8000 from the Consortium Series, Maiden Noir black slim denim, a white T or vintage pro-war graphic T from the first Desert Storm, or a 1986 airbrush of a zombie vomiting from Hampton Beach, a Pendleton coat, and a leather duffle bag (by Surface to Air) or Supreme Rucksack.

What do you give the most attention to: shoes, belts, glasses?
It's lucky if I even have clean socks. Shoes are the only thing that I focus on.

What item can't you live without?
"Hope I never lose my wallet," Mighty Mighty Bosstones. My mum got it for me. It's bootleg alligator skin with a map of Thailand on it.

Do you change your look a lot?
Yes, I'm always season appropriate with pieces and colors. I swap out my kicks twice a day. For fall, I'm wearing a lot of hockey jerseys and a Mexican blanket jacket that matches my Bone Thugs-N-Harmony cap.

Do you dress differently DJing, skateboarding and working at the store?
All exactly the same, except my footwear while skating is strictly Vans. The other varying factor is how much I sweat through my clothes. In order of most sweat to least, it would be skateboarding, DJing, store.

As a DJ, music must impact your dress.
Of course. I DJ with Kon and spend half the day listening to music while programming or designing or just chillaxing (is that word a real word? I heard it from a blonde person in Cali.) at home or at the shop. Music is woven into anything I do.

What else inspires your style?
I'm inspired by my friends. Architecture, fonts and furniture design somehow play a role. I'm also influenced by the philosophical/sentimental meaning behind the pieces I have in rotation. By philosophical, I'd be referring to a Martin Luther King Jr. "I Have a Dream" T-shirt. I guess style icons would include Steve McQueen (high brow/ low class) and my two partners at Bodega, Dan Natola and Jay Gordon. Without them, I'd be asking you if you wanted fries with that.

How do you spot a good vintage find?
1: It has to be free of blood stains, bullet holes and semen. 2: Good fit and condition. 3: It's probably from Bobby's. Also, while shopping in general, it's best not to be under the influence of alcohol or narcotics. And shop on a full stomach and only spontaneously when you have no idea what your bank account looks like. Unplanned purchases (much like children) are sometimes the best and most cherished.

How do you get your hands on the exclusive clothing samples you own?
I interact with designers from various brands and labels. I send them mix tapes, images from my "awesome folder" [stuff that inspires him] or products that only Bodega stocks for exchange. Also, I get a lot of gifts somehow from the aforementioned contacts—still not sure how I pulled that off.

How important is exclusivity to what you wear and sell?
Not actually important compared to life, famine, death or war. But in terms of a competitive advantage in the marketplace, it does play a significant role. As a buyer and designer, you just end up collecting rare things along the way. I have a 50-pound cement bust of Mr. T, for example. ✖✖✖

Extreme Makeover: Fairy Godmother Edition

GOWN ON HER LUCK

BOSTON BALLET opens its 2008–2009 season with a safe bet, bringing back its 2005 reimagining of Cinderella. From Oct. 16–26, Prokofiev's score gets a contemporary twirl with James Kudelka's choreography and David Boeche's art-deco design. There's less gauze, more Roaring '20s swing—even the wicked stepmother has a Greta Garbo makeover. But despite the setting, the story's the same fairy tale about love conquering all.

Don't Drink the Water

Merrily Down the Stream

Lest you've forgotten that the river is for more than sailing, the annual Head of the Charles Regatta is back Oct. 18 and 19—the largest competition of its kind. Watch thousands of athletes from around the world hit the water in some 55 long-boat races. The event drew 300,000 spectators last year, so it should be a fun mixer for those of us not rowing until we puke.

Capsules by Sean Burns

Burn After Reading ★★★ ½ Don't be fooled by the vibrant colors of Emmanuel Lubezki's cinematography or the giant cartoon performances of the cast, because Joel and Ethan Coen's follow-up to their masterful No Country for Old Men is every bit as bleak as its Oscar-lauded predecessor. It's just a heck of a lot funnier. For reasons too convoluted to explain here, Brad Pitt's exuberant himbo gym instructor tries blackmailing John Malkovich's boozy CIA burnout, with more than a few unforeseen complications arriving via George Clooney's sleazy lothario and Tilda Swinton as the world's meanest pediatrician. Shot, cut and scored with the ominous overtones of a paranoid thriller yet performed as broad farce for maximum dissonance, the Coens send all this silliness spiraling into bloodshed with clockwork precision. Like most of the movies from these gifted, dyspeptic brothers, Burn is secretly about the tragic smallness of people and the fatality of self-absorption. Every character is doomed by assuming they're more important to the plot than they actually are. (At Boston Common, Fenway and in the suburbs.)

Choke ★★ ½ Actor-turned-director Clark Gregg's cheerfully offensive, visually pedestrian adaptation of Chuck Palahniuk's beloved cult novel is another extensively annotated manual of modern male malaise. The invaluable Sam Rockwell stars as a self-loathing sex addict who hustles folks for money by pretending to choke at upscale restaurants. The root of his issues begins with childhood trauma at the hands of his insane mom (Anjelica Houston), while her angelic doctor (Kelly Macdonald) suggests there might be some divine intervention at work. Nobody does dirtbags better than Rockwell, always showing us the lost little boy lurking beneath the stripper jokes and blasphemous asides. Deliberately lo-fi and dingy, the movie attempts to ground Palahniuk's surreal tangents in ugly, everyday surroundings, but the choice undercuts this very funny film as the storyline exits the realm of the rational. The flat, distant direction keeps us walled out of Rockwell's mounting paranoia. For the loony finale to pay off, we need to share his mania, not just observe it. (At Boston Common, Coolidge Corner and in the suburbs.)

The Dark Knight ★★★ ½ Astoundingly ambitious, The Dark Knight is summer blockbuster as dialectical exercise. It's a philosophical debate among agents of order and chaos, punctuated with the spectacle of a depressed billionaire in flying-rodent drag beating up a psychotic clown. Preoccupied, as most of us have been for the past seven years, with how far one must go to combat an inexplicable enemy, the film wrestles with so many meaty ideas and timely concerns, you can't quite wrap your head around it all in just one viewing. As the Joker, Heath Ledger's final completed performance is the sort of roiling, balls-to-the-wall turn from which legends are made. And director Christopher Nolan ruthlessly whittles every interaction down to the barest of essentials. Yet, he cuts so quickly in and out of scenes we hardly have time to absorb vital information. The film might be too aggressive and propulsive for its own good. It's about a half-hour of breathing room away from the masterpiece it yearns to be. (At Boston Common and in the suburbs.)

The Duchess ★★ Relatively painless, at least by the standards of awards-season chum, this overdesigned costume drama stars a too-modern Keira Knightley as poor Georgiana Spencer, a woman trapped in an arranged marriage to Ralph Fiennes' dreaded Duke of Devonshire. She's expected to produce an heir, and any paltry concerns like conversation are beside the point. A beloved fashionista and belle of the Whig Party, Georgiana's sprawling social life can't compensate for her domestic drudgery, especially after the Duke installs his mistress (Hayley Atwell) in a bedroom down the hall. The filmmakers pound home the historical parallels between Georgiana and Princess Diana, to the point where you can't help imagining a paparazzi pursuit of her horse-drawn carriage. The film's saving grace is Fiennes' persnickety performance. His mouth turned down in a contemptuous sneer, he plays the Duke not as a villain, but as a simple man suffering from such selfish tunnel vision that he responds to all the tears and ruined lives in his wake with surprised annoyance. (At Boston Common, Kendall Square and West Newton Cinema.)

Flash of Genius ★ ½ Director Marc Abraham's debut follows a long patent dispute regarding the invention of the intermittent windshield-wiper motor. It's not as exciting as it sounds. Greg Kinnear stars as Bob Kearns, a devoted dad who sees his design stolen by the Ford Motor Company, then spends the rest of his life fighting for credit. Structured as a simplistic David and Goliath story and photographed like a 1980s TV movie, Flash of Genius follows plucky Bob as he wrangles with legal issues for years on end and immerses himself in Byzantine law precedents while his family

Blindness
★ ½
Starring Julianne Moore, Mark Ruffalo, Gael García Bernal, Alice Braga, Danny Glover, Yusuke Iseya, Don McKellar and Sandra Oh. Based on the novel by Jose Saramago. Screenplay by Don McKellar. Directed by Fernando Meirelles. At Boston Common, Fenway and in the suburbs.

HOLLYWOOD HAS A misconception that great books make for great movies.

Roger Ebert once astutely pointed out that the best films are more like short stories. Strict limitations regarding time and place offer a tighter crucible of experience and immediacy that translates far better than a novel, which by its nature is free to wander over expansive periods. In literature, characters explore abstract symbology, but the minute you have actors in these roles, the theoretical artifice becomes awkward as you're actually looking at it.

Folks forget that The Godfather was a pulpy beach book, and that Mario Puzo was the John Grisham of his time. The Bridges of Madison County would still be an absurd, housewife fantasy were it not for the sensitivity Clint Eastwood brought to the big-screen version. Yet the works of Philip Roth are routinely defiled. Bad books just make for better movies.

Fernando Meirelles' Blindness might be the ultimate example of this phenomenon. Based on Nobel laureate José Saramago's lavishly praised novel, this is a premise without a film—a five-course dinner that's nothing but spinach. It's filled with characters who talk down to you and overexplain. There's an almost complete ignorance of storytelling basics by an attention-addled director who loves thudding, visual curlicues.

Julianne Moore and Mark Ruffalo star as "the Doctor's Wife" and "the Doctor." (How much do you already hate a movie too pretentious to supply proper names?) They're perfectly happy ignoring one another in static suburban bliss, until a panicked patient (Yusuke Isyea) arrives in the ornery ophthalmologist's office complaining of hysterical blindness. Everything has gone white. "It's like I'm drowning in a sea of milk," he cries—a sensation Meirelles replicates by cracking open the aperture and flooding the exposure with eye-piercing white light every few seconds. It's evocative and visually arresting the first 30 or 40 times.

Unfortunately, Patient X starts an epidemic, and soon every extra on set turns up suffering from the same complaint. Moore can still see just fine but fakes being blind, while a vaguely Orwellian World Health Organization (headed by a sinister Sandra Oh) quarantines them in a dingy, abandoned insane asylum. These dilapidated floors become ground zero for a deeply unpleasant rehash of Lord of the Flies, with Y Tu Mamá También's Gael García Bernal taking charge as the resident monarch, brandishing the institution's lone firearm and raping at will.

It's gross, unpleasant and symbolic in ways that don't really make much sense. Blindness reeks of allegory, but Meirelles films the squalor as if he's aiming for documentary realism. This flashy yet fundamentally shallow director first earned hosannas for the Brazilian crime drama City of God, which bored me into embarrassingly loud snores. His perplexingly acclaimed adaptation of John le Carré's The Constant Gardener proved even stupider, using AIDS-stricken Africans as props in a crummy, sub–Roger Moore espionage thriller.

Blindness doesn't have an engine. It's one of those movies where you don't dare look at your watch as it could end in 10 minutes or two hours, and nothing will have changed. The point about us all being blind philosophically is made in the first reel, then reiterated ad infinitum. Things pick up, at least visually, once Moore leads the flock outside the prison walls into some devastated, expensively trashed Canadian sets, but then they're all just kind of stuck wandering around in circles to show off some exemplary production design.

Screenwriter Don McKellar (who also plays a bit part as a chatty carjacker) actually worked this terrain before. In 1998 he wrote and directed a little-seen Canadian film called Last Night, which addressed the apocalypse in dryly funny, matter-of-fact terms. Blindness is like watching a steroid-fueled blowup of that understated gem—minus the wit and enlightenment. ✖✖✖ falls apart, which all builds up to the inevitable courtroom theatrics. Despite Kinnear's attempts to hint at a darker side, Kearns is pure milquetoast. Lauren Graham tamps down her charisma and sleepwalks through the long-suffering wife routine, and even dependable Dermot Mulroney flatlines as Bob's business partner. The only pizzazz arrives via a brief, hambone turn from Alan Alda as a smooth-talking lawyer who seems to have wandered in from another, far more engaging movie. (At Boston Common, Fenway and in the suburbs.)

Ghost Town ★★ David Koepp is Hollywood's go-to screenplay fixer for every big-budget production plagued with multiple drafts of conflicting scripts from various writers. Whether we're talking Mission: Impossible, Spider-Man or the most recent Indiana Jones, Koepp can be counted on to synthesize it all into something filmable. So it's fitting that his latest directorial effort is a mishmash of Always, The Sixth Sense, Groundhog Day and at least a dozen other, more original movies. Ricky Gervais, the brilliant creator of BBC's The Office and Extras, slums for a Hollywood paycheck as a curmudgeonly dentist who sees dead people, while Greg Kinnear's obnoxious tuxedoed specter haunts him into busting up the remarriage plans of widow Téa Leoni. Koepp's camera placement is as prosaic as his cut-and-paste screenplay, with the only fresh air arriving via Gervais' invaluable ad-libbing and surprising chemistry with Leoni. The unlikely couple tries in vain to make the movie more than an exhausted photocopy. (At Boston Common, Fenway and in the suburbs.)

Hamlet 2 ★★ ½ You've heard of a comedy of embarrassment, now get ready for a comedy of abject mortification. For whatever reason, British superstar Steve Coogan has yet to score much traction in the States, but that should change after this erratic, eventually hilarious farce. Coogan stars as a shameless high-school drama teacher who pens an ill-advised sequel to Shakespeare's masterpiece in the hopes of salvaging his school's endangered theatre program. He gets more than he bargained for once word of his production's tacky blasphemy reaches the media. (The short version: Jesus Christ borrows his dad's time machine in order to rescue all the characters that died at the end of Hamlet.) Director Andrew Fleming tends to err on the side of volume, blowing up jokes a few sizes larger than they need to be. But this weakness becomes a strength once the curtain rises on the play itself, a gaudy craptacular of such epic tastelessness that it alone is worth the price of admission. The final reel redeems a lot of early sins. (In the suburbs.)

The House Bunny ★★ ½ Ditzy, perennial scene-stealer Anna Faris is often the best thing in some extremely bad movies. Hopefully that'll change after this cheerful lark in which Faris finally takes center stage. The ebullient bubble-brain stars as an aging Playboy Playmate banished from Hef's mansion after her 27th birthday. As we're informed, "That's 59 in Bunny Years." Faris soon finds herself nurturing a misfit sorority full of sad, nerdy girls, but the inevitable makeovers and education in men's magazine philosophies take a couple of unforeseen turns. Legally Blonde screenwriters Karen McCullah Lutz and Kirsten Smith recycle huge chunks of their previous script, as, once again, the campus bimbo proves brighter than expected. Directed with indifference by Fred Wolf, The House Bunny is carried by killer comic turns by Faris and her costar Emma Stone. The former makes wide-eyed obliviousness endearing, while Stone's snorting dorkiness is a revelation. They both deserve a better movie. (At Boston Common and in the suburbs.)

How to Lose Friends & Alienate People ★ ½ This hokey adaptation of Toby Young's memoir is dated and, like the author himself, nowhere near as edgy or amusing as it thinks it is. The self-styled rebel made a ruckus at Vanity Fair in the go-go '90s, crashing and burning on a booze-fueled romp with the jet set, and this big-screen bungling fares no better. Simon Pegg charmlessly steps into Young's shoes, irritating the in-crowd of Manhattan elites with his soccer hooligan behavior and lusting after Megan Fox's empty-headed starlet. Quaintly pretending the Internet doesn't exist, while simultaneously exhibiting no understanding of how magazines, publicists or even movies actually work, director Robert Weide keeps to garishly overlit slapstick. Constantly referencing Fellini's La Dolce Vita as a cheap shortcut, the movie squanders countless opportunities to skewer our Paris Hilton celebutante era. Only Jeff Bridges, in a Ben Franklin wig as a poorly disguised Graydon Carter, summons the appropriate aura of pampered self-loathing. (At Boston Common, Fenway and in the suburbs.)

Lakeview Terrace ★★ ½ In a long-ago era called the 1990s, director Neil LaBute's cloddish button-pushing was considered fashionable, and the shallow, stagey misanthropy of In the Company of Men or Your Friends and Neighbors opened to inexplicable critical praise. Recently, times have been rough for LaBute, as anyone who saw his unintentionally hilarious remake of The Wicker Man can attest. However, the chic, vacuous cynic may have finally found his true calling. Lakeview Terrace is a prefab Hollywood thriller destined for Sunday afternoon cable, but the director sprays a thick coat of his patented distaste over this umpteenth remake of Unlawful Entry, and the result is improbably entertaining. Samuel L. Jackson stars as a scary, boozy cop terrorizing his haughty, environmentalist neighbors Patrick Wilson and Kerry Washington. LaBute's puddle-deep provocations regarding race and gender, now free from an art-house backdrop, are perfectly suited for the empty jolts of crass exploitation common in pictures like this one. (At Boston Common, Fenway and in the suburbs.)

Man on Wire ★★★ ½ Funny how the most exciting heist picture in ages turns out to be a documentary. Director James Marsh's artfully crafted, edge-of-your-seat adventure tells the tale of tightrope walker Philipe Petit, who one morning in 1974 danced on a high-wire between the World Trade Center's Twin Towers. Combining hyperbolically shot reenactments and stunning archival footage with the gregarious reminiscences of Petit and his band of coconspirators, Marsh lays out the elaborate break-in with the snap precision and cinematic verve of a Danny Ocean caper. All the more poignant for never once mentioning 9/11, the movie uses old photographs to let the majestic towers speak for themselves, which lends Man On Wire a shade of sorrow the filmmaker is wise enough not to push. Petit is a florid and quixotic interview subject perfectly in sync with the film's evocation of the anything-goes paradise that was New York City in the 1970s. The breathtaking climax triggers many contradictory emotions as Petit's stunt was so reckless, so foolish and so magical. (At Kendall Square and the Waltham Embassy.)

Miracle at St. Anna ★ ½ Spike Lee is one of the most exciting filmmakers we have, but he doesn't make small mistakes. His failures are as bold as his successes, as evidenced by this hysterically overwrought wreck that attempts to rebuke Hollywood for whitewashing the contributions of African American soldiers in the Great War. Based on a novel by James McBride, it begins with an outrageously unnecessary framing device full of distracting cameos by Lee's stock company, and the film only grows more rudderless from there. The snarled chronology finds flashbacks inside flashbacks, but eventually we land on four deeply unappealing buffalo soldiers speechifying behind enemy lines in Tuscany. Aesthetically, one minute Lee's trying to mimic the stagebound look of 1940s WWII flicks, and the next he's working rhythms from the 1950s' Italian neo-realist movement. These conflicting styles keep clanging against one another, and the battle sequences prove shockingly poor for a director of Lee's caliber. Watch out for sexism and the forehead-smacking, pseudo-religious finale. (At Boston Common, Fenway and in the suburbs.)

Nick and Norah's Infinite Playlist ★★★ ½ If you can get past the most twee movie title in years, director Peter Sollett's follow-up to his endearing indie hit Raising Victor Vargas turns out to be unexpectedly adorable. It's sincere and awkward where Juno was fabricated and crass. Michael Cera stars as a heartbroken teen bass player, a straight man in an all-gay punk band, the name of which cannot be printed here. Through a variety of convoluted circumstances, he finds himself stuck in a Yugo after a gig with Kat Dennings' insecure dreamgirl. They cruise the streets of New York City after curfew, meandering through misadventures and fumbling toward puppy love. Based on a young adult novel by Rachel Cohn and David Levithan, Nick and Norah exudes an uncommon sensitivity, patiently allowing these kids to mumble and make mistakes, so unlike their poised peers on film and television. As in Victor Vargas, there's a real delicacy to Sollett's direction, with an almost enchanted sense of late-night magic infusing his grungy East Village settings. (At Boston Common, Fenway and in the suburbs.)

Righteous Kill ★ It's just sad. Thirteen years ago Al Pacino and Robert De Niro teamed up to deliver towering performances in Michael Mann's intricate cops-and-robbers epic Heat, in which they shrewdly mined their iconic '70s personas to set a '90s standard for alpha male swagger. Now they're together again for Jon Avnet's atrocious Righteous Kill, a cheap, gimmicky vigilante thriller adept only at showing just how far the mighty have fallen. Both actors are at least two decades too old for their roles as beat detectives tracking a serial killer who hunts bad guys and writes lousy poetry. A bored Pacino chews a lot of gum and bugs his eyes out occasionally, while De Niro's work is a genuine tragedy. Lazy and overweight, he mopes and mumbles his way through the movie unable to convincingly portray anger. Russell Gewirtz's sorry screenplay hinges on a plot twist telegraphed from the very first frames, so Avnet ladles on the labored misdirection and misogyny to distract us from the obvious. Depressing. (At Boston Common, Fenway and in the suburbs.)

Towelhead ★ ½ Hack sitcom writer Alan Ball is at it again with this empty provocation that's nearly as classy and subtle as its title. Based on the acclaimed novel by Alicia Erian, the movie desperately wants to be pushy and transgressive, but it's so airless and devoid of empathy that it feels hermetically sealed inside a bubble of smugness. Summer Bishil stars as Jasira, a half-Lebanese adolescent in a Texas suburb who struggles with her burgeoning sexuality. She's so traumatized by tampons that a colleague dubbed the film Are You There, Allah? It's Me Margaret. The movie rallies disgust for Aaron Eckhart, the army reservist neighbor and proud Texan who graphically molests young Jasira. Ball deals with some loaded imagery, basically depicting the U.S. military raping a Middle Eastern virgin. But the metaphor never coalesces into anything beyond exploitation. Towelhead keeps kicking around explosive signifiers and shock-value moments that Ball doesn't have a clue how to handle. (At Kendall Square and Waltham Embassy.)

Tropic Thunder ★★★ Ben Stiller's scabrous Hollywood satire misses about as often as it hits, so it's good those hits are vicious. Sending up the absurd egomania of Tinseltown's elite, the flick follows a handful of prima donnas on an ill-fated attempt to infuse a tacky Vietnam War epic with method-acting madness. Stiller is merely adequate as a musclebound action hero seeking artistic credibility, but the character's misguided attempt to woo Academy voters by portraying a mentally challenged, buck-toothed stutterer named Simple Jack might be the best skewering of Oscar pandering ever filmed. Equally audacious is Robert Downey Jr.'s transcendent turn as a pompous Australian playing an African-American GI. There's no way the bit should work, but Downey is such a magician it's somehow charming. Less successful are one-note mug-a-thons from Jack Black and Tom Cruise, and the movie's wobbly structure exposes Stiller's sketch comedy roots. But whenever Tropic Thunder lands a blow, it hurts. (At Boston Common, Fenway and in the suburbs.)

Vicky Cristina Barcelona ★★ ½ Though problematic and slightly sloppy, this pleasant trifle is Woody Allen's most consistent effort since 1999's loopy La Strada remake, Sweet and Lowdown. Rebecca Hall and Scarlett Johansson star as Vicky and Cristina, American postgrads spending a summer in Spain. Enter Javier Bardem's free-spirited Latin lover and stock stereotype, who probably would be risible if played by any other actor. Bardem delivers his loosest, goofiest performance yet, embracing the role's mildewed clichés with contagious delight. Romantic entanglements and disentanglements ensue, complicated by stomach ulcers, girl-girl crushes and ill-advised rushes to the altar. The most fun comes from Bardem's ex-wife, a lusty psycho played in a movie-stealing turn by Penélope Cruz. Allen's direction is perkier and more alert than his recent work; he even moves the camera once in a while, soaking up the Barcelona scenery and gazing adoringly on his good-looking cast. Modest in both aim and accomplishment, it's hardly a return to form, but it'll do. (At Boston Common, Kendall Square and Waltham Embassy.)

Wall-E ★★★★ Here's one for the ages. The crowning achievement from Pixar Animation Studios depicts a ruined Earth, some seven hundred years in the future, where a lonely trash compactor sorts his way through mountains of garbage, his only friend a remarkably resilient cockroach. Owing more to Charlie Chaplin than Bugs Bunny, the staggering early reels of Wall-E are devoid of any dialogue, working in a language of pure visual expression and brilliant soundscapes by Star Wars guru Ben Burtt. The lovesick travails of our adorable title character are as moving as any movie I've seen. In the second half, director Andrew Stanton switches gears into a less lyrical, more aggressively satirical mode, and introduces us to a future of overfed coach potatoes stranded in space after wrecking our planet. It's a pretty savage social commentary, but I was more interested in Wall-E and Eve, his shiny iPod-looking babe who packs a mean phaser and enlists a cuckoo's nest of malfunctioning robots to help save us all from bad programming. It's an instant classic. (In the suburbs.)

The Women ★★ The best joke in Diane English's klutzy update of George Cukor's 1939 classic might be the overabundance of screamingly obvious Boston locations, even though characters onscreen insist they're standing in Manhattan. Meg Ryan attempts to emote through some dire plastic surgery, puckering her inflated trout-pout after finding her hubby having an affair with Eva Mendes, an actress as curvy as her line readings are flat. Annette Bening rallies the rest of the Ya-Ya Sisterhood of the Traveling Whatever, and lots of shrieking ensues. There's a surprisingly complex, scene-stealing turn from Candice Bergen as Ryan's seen-it-all mom and a few good character riffs from guest-stars Cloris Leachman and Bette Midler, but English, creator of Murphy Brown, suffers from a visually inert TV sensibility. The Women feels more like a promising sitcom pilot, one that's somehow easier to take simply because none of these characters are as narcissistic, materialistic or disgusting as the ones in Sex and the City. (At Boston Common, Fenway and in the suburbs.)

ACROSS THE LINES

Cold War Kids show faith in broadly burnished character sketches.

Cold War Kids play the Paradise Rock Club Oct. 14.

THE C-WORD DIDN'T HURT U2 or Kings of Leon. But Cold War Kids endured an early backlash from indie-rock tastemakers like Pitchfork upon the release of the band's blog-boosted 2006 debut Robbers & Cowards. Although the album earned broad acclaim, doubters seized the angle that lead singer Nathan Willett, guitarist Jonnie Russell and bassist Matt Maust met at an evangelical Christian college in Los Angeles, and that Russell's father is a preacher.

Not that anyone would surmise that background from Robbers & Cowards' dark, damaged characters, who include a booze-beaten

dad and a death-row inmate. It's much the same tone with their new release Loyalty to Loyalty. "We will talk about sex, talk about the pope in Prada shoes," Willett, 28, sings in lead track "Against Privacy." So what about that Christian tag?

"On one level, it looks like maybe we're conservative or narrowed by that—or it's kind of humorous and there is a cool level of the myth," he says. "As far as what I do lyrically or what we're about as a group, it's much more in the line of Leonard Cohen, wanting to use that imagery of spirituality and religion for the means of art."

People might still reach for an explanation for Cold War Kids' fervent delivery, although one could consider other influences such as Bob Dylan, Billie Holiday, the Velvet Underground and Jeff Buckley. Willett's brassy, brink-of-braying vocals bring Buckley to mind, not even so much for the use of falsetto as for that fearless touch of urgency.

Then there's the punk element. Willett, who plays piano and guitar, says he didn't relate to the So-Cal punk scene and never joined bands as a teen. Yet he saw a different energy in the East Coast outfits Hot Water Music and Fugazi. 'That was punk in ways," he says, "but they also seemed like something very unique in their rhythms and their words."

His Long Beach quartet—named after a graphic-design Web site launched by bassist

Cold War Kids' stark, stewing rock is undercut with a raw soulfulness and jazz and blues.

Maust—marches to its own unique rhythms and words. Their stark, stewing rock is undercut with a raw soulfulness and crisp echoes of jazz and blues in guitarist Russell's reverb-toned burnish and drummer Matt Aveiro's off-beat accents. "When we all get together, that's what comes out," says Willett, calling Cold War Kids "more of a soul-punk band that borrows some things from jazz."

His words, on the other hand, are rooted in intellectual territory. Asked about the album title Loyalty to Loyalty, he credits it to the early 1900s philosopher Josiah Royce, whose ideas about the individual in a community ran counter to those of Friedrich Nietzsche. "I really liked the phrase a lot," Willett says. "I like that your goal is not to be loyal to your job or your wife or your church or whatever, it's to be loyal to loyalty."

He also relates Royce's concept to the stomping "Welcome to the Occupation," a more autobiographical song informed by his stint as a high-school English teacher who felt his creativity was squelched. "You go into a job where you want to have a noble sense of giving and being a part of the system and working within it to make it great," he says, "and [you end up] feeling very defeated by it.

"Characters resonate with me for different reasons, so there's always a little bit of autobiography," Willett continues. However, he can cast odd impressions when he chooses to write characters in the first person, as he does in the saloon-style "Golden Gate Jumpers" or the bleak "Every Man I Fall For," where he assumes the perspective of a woman.

"Women still generally get more screwed by men than vice versa," Willett says from his Long Beach home. "I come from a divorced family where I watched my mom be a single woman dating, so I think I've always been more sensitive to observing women in the way they are more vulnerable."

The singer and his characters are poised to come to life when Cold War Kids hit the Paradise Rock Club Oct. 14, as even pesky naysayers tend to give props to the group's unhinged live sets. As Willett puts it, "We like to leave a lot of space for things to just surprise." ×××

Sweet & Sour

Her Madgesty

It's been an eventful year for Madonna. The singer celebrated her 50th birthday by being inducted into the Rock & Roll Hall of Fame, denied rumors of an affair with A-Rod, shrugged off an unauthorized biography written by her brother and launched her Sticky & Sweet Tour. The Queen of Pop also cut ties with old pal Warner Brothers to sign a 10-year contract with Live Nation, meaning she'll be strutting on the stadium stage into her 60s. Hey, it worked for Mick Jagger. Head to the TD Banknorth Garden on Oct. 15 or 16 to watch the Material Mom perform hits like "4 Minutes," produced and recorded with Justin Timberlake, and the iconic but increasingly abstract "Like a Virgin." Thais Collins

Mind Blowing

Body Language

Artist Tyson Schroeder, who dabbled in children's literature with Holden the Elephant, reinhabits the adult world at the Experimental Art Gallery and Studio through Nov. 2. In Schroeder's exhibit Knees and Elbows: Drawings of Parts, he lets his subjects' bodies do the talking—and by the looks of things, they've been through a lot.

Rockie Horoscope {ROCKIE GARDINER}

WEIGHING OPTIONS

[SEPTEMBER 23–OCTOBER 22]
Rather than track Mercury's retrograde trip through your sign for the first time in six years recalling personal history you'd rather forget, concentrate instead on the progress your Venus ruler is making. On Oct. 9, the goddess perfects a heartfelt trine to innovative Uranus that could show you something you didn't fully realize—for instance, a sudden attraction to Kitty's vet. How much faith you should place in this realization may be revealed before the Columbus Day weekend is over.

SCORPIO [October 23–November 21]
Follow the feminine, not the femme fatale. Although Venus traipsing through your sign may be leading you on, the goddess can offer her unbridled support to your involvement with a neighbor as well as your predilection for unusual playmates. What she doesn't favor, and what she could give you grief about, is your willingness to believe the delusions permeating the atmosphere at home. Maybe your landlord is being deceitful, maybe a relative is out of touch with reality or maybe you're watching too much TV.

SAGITTARIUS [November 22–December 21] Until Mercury comes out of retrograde on the Oct. 15, you could be stuck in the past. Issues that recently seemed of utmost importance can be subject to one revision after another. Not to worry; the purpose of a retrograde session is to give you sufficient time to review what's been happening and, since this one takes place in sociable Libra, to renew your ties to former colleagues and members of your club. Chances are something beneficial will emerge from your current trip down memory lane. You'll just have to wait and see what it is.

CAPRICORN [December 22–January 20]
Maybe it's still a favorite fantasy or maybe you're actually earning money from an image you created or the music you play. Either way, there's some sort of reward in store when the sun in your Libra career zone supports artistic Neptune in your money house. Because it might not materialize until the Aries full moon midmonth, don't make the folks in charge uncomfortable by asking if the check is in the mail. Deep down you know that lucky Jupiter will watch out for you while it remains in Capricorn. After that, it'll protect your assets.

AQUARIUS [January 21–February 18]
Don't jump to conclusions. A terrific opportunity could morph out of what appears at first to be a stressful situation. That's likely to happen when value-conscious Venus in your Scorpio career house puts pressure on impressionable, idealistic Neptune in your sign. Water Bearers, especially those involved in the arts, may be forced to come up with an exceptionally imaginative solution to the problem. Others might have to wing it or string a demanding boss along until the end of October.

PISCES [February 19–March 19]
Thinking about ways to get your hands on more of OPM (other people's money) and/or making plans for how you're going to spend it could be on your mind until your solar eighth house—the area currently hosting the planets in Libra and Scorpio—is finally empty. Prepare to be patient; it may take until Thanksgiving dinner before you see your way clear of the complications accompanying this tricky business. While you're at it, why not give some thought to where you want to spend the holidays and with whom?

ARIES [March 20–April 19]
Now that your crusading Mars ruler is in Scorpio, the fixed Water (as in ice cube) sign it corules with Pluto, you have a good excuse for abandoning an attempt at maintaining harmony with either an ally or an adversary. Battling Rams involved in a lawsuit might choose not to settle, but to soldier on. A whiff of recklessness emanating from the top rung of your solar chart suggests that your boss, a client or an optimistic parent is eager to take a chance you don't agree with. Stick to your guns until the Aries full moon on the Oct. 14 sheds more light on the subject.

TAURUS [April 20–May 20]
As long as your Venus ruler is visiting your Scorpio marriage house (until Oct. 18), the Bull would be wise to follow where the goddess leads. Even if it means headfirst into an event that's bound to surprise, possibly even shock you. And yes, assorted acquaintances, particularly the weird ones, will be present. The aftermath of that occasion could result in more heartfelt apologies and mea culpas than you've heard in a long while—enough to inspire an artistic interpretation of the entire experience. Bring the camera.

GEMINI [May 21–June 20]
Is it a true romance or simply recreation? While your Mercury ruler takes its retrograde trip through your Libra house of pure love and/or pleasurable pursuits, you may have to make a choice. Before you commit to one definition or another, let enough time elapse. You've endured enough periods of retrogression to know that information you were unaware of tends to pop up when you least expect it. Also when it's especially uncomfortable. Because it's been six years since the Messenger flipped in Libra, you need to be reminded.

CANCER [June 21–July 22]
The Moon Child shouldn't linger too long contemplating various domestic issues. While Mercury is retrograde, those matters are bound to go through some sort of metamorphosis. Although, if other family members are heavily invested in what's going on, then by all means slow down and consider the ramifications of your choice. Just don't make it final until Mercury has been facing forward for a while, say a week after the full moon on the 14th clarifies the situation.

LEO [July 23–August 22]
That little bird may be telling you something important, so take the time to listen to your inner voice and trust your instincts. That's what the meeting between your sun ruler and Mercury on the 6th was for. Even when retrograde, the Messenger's job is to inform you about something related to your current situation. That the data may change when Mercury is direct again is just the way the ball occasionally bounces. A reward for having faith in your partner is due during the Libra-sun–Aries-full-moon polarity.

VIRGO [August 23–September 22]
Since a lot of the forecast revolves around your Mercury ruler, you might benefit from reading the entire column. The Mercury-sun conjunction on Oct. 6, one of six a year, could have stopped you dead in your tracks. Because the merger took place in your Libra money house, what you learned may help you figure out what to do about your assets. Just remember that Mercury, by changing direction again on the 15th can provide an entirely different perspective. Some of the questions you had answers for will have to be decided again.

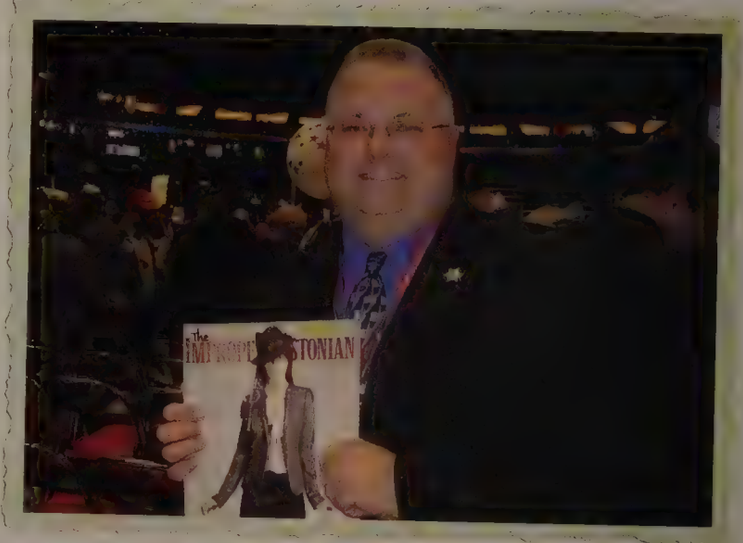
ATTENTION BOUNTY HUNTERS! BONUS POINTS TO ANYONE WHO CAN CAPTURE AN IMPROPER READER WEARING A ROBERT DOWNEY JR. MASK AT THE IRONMAN TRIATHLON, HELD OCT. 11 IN KAILUA-KONA, HAWAII

Unlike the rest of your friends, we want to see the photos from your next trip. Where did you take us? Send us a picture of you or a buddy, or better yet, someone famous reading THE IMPROPER BOSTONIAN and tell us where you were. The wilder your destination and the more creative your photo, the better your chances of making the cut in the esteemed IMPROPER Sightings.

Emily Ackman and Michael Goldstein visited Alaska's Harvard Glacier. You know it's Harvard by the look on its face when you mention having attended Brown.

Ken Mack took us to the Acropolis in Athens, Greece. We'd write a funny quip here, but we're all out of good material. After all, he's a Mack. We're only a PC.

Chloe Magner brought us down to Washington, D.C., for a visit to the White House. Shortly thereafter, President Bush was seen panhandling for $700 billion.



Plymouth County sheriff Joseph McDonald Jr. shot this photo at the RNC in St. Paul, Minn., but he didn't shoot the deputy.

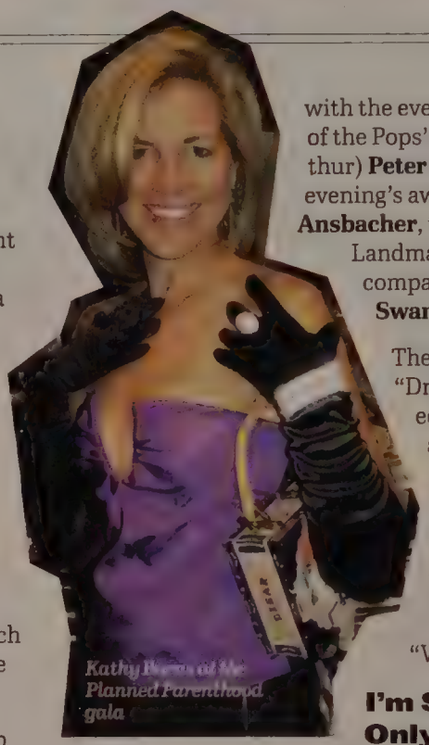
WET-HOT FUNDRAISER



Kathy Rogers at the Planned Parenthood gala

Sunglasses Might've Come in Handy...

It wasn't the most marvelous night for a Moondance, given the rainstorm that made the tent on the banks of the Charles feel like an Indian sweat lodge, but a cocktail or two into it, no one seemed to care much, and by the time dinner was served, the skies had cleared and the tent opened to a beautiful late-summer's evening.

As one guest put it, the fundraiser for the Esplanade Association "is the first big party of the season, so everyone's blah, blah, blah-ing," which posed a bit of a challenge for the entertainment.

John Stetson was more than up to the task, though, wowing the crowd with his feats of mentalism, and it was amusing to see a group of otherwise worldly adults look like awestruck kindergartners (even the ones with bad facelifts).

Amidst the crowd, you could glimpse the likes of the dazzling Judi and Douglas Krupp, Brookline doyenne Diane Gordon and her husband, Lloyd, Beacon Hillions Suki and Miguel de Braganca and Joe and Kristin Casey, power couple Carol and Bernie Fulp, the lovely Nancy Adams, force of nature Jeryl Oristaglio with the ever-affable Steve, and son of the Pops' founding conductor (Arthur) Peter Fiedler, who presented the evening's award to honoree Charles Ansbacher, the conductor of the Boston Landmarks Orchestra, who was accompanied by his wife, ambassador Swanee Hunt.

The invitation, which read "Dress to Dazzle," was interpreted widely (think diamonds and sequins), and in some cases unfortunately—like the two men who greeted each other by saying:

"I look like a refugee from the Game Show Network!"

"Well, I look like a pimp!"

I'm Sorry, but We've Only Got Geritol...

It was impossible to say who was younger or better-looking—the dancers or the guests—at the Young Partners of the Boston Ballet's cocktail party held at the Achilles Project.

The über-sparkly attendees included newlyweds Chad Jackson and Kathryn Burton, gorgeous gallery owner Laura Littlechild, stunning BU student Erica Chin, the store's owner Michael Krupp, chef/heartthrob Michael Leviton, and so on and so on.

Mikko Nissinen at the Young Partners of the Boston Ballet's party

Christy Scott Cashman and Terri Pyatt at Moondance

Glynis Gozigian and Leigh Weatherly Denny at the Planned Parenthood gala

In fact, the crowd was so intimidatingly attractive that one man turned to his date and said, "I feel like a fossil here. I think I'll order a prune-flavored martini."

Sex Ed...

How many Sarah Palin jokes can you hear at one party? Apparently, an infinite number, especially if the event in question is the super-swanky 80th Anniversary Gala for Planned Parenthood, which transformed the sterile boxiness of the World Trade Center into a gorgeous and ultra-glam 1930s movie set.

"You know you're at a fun party when the table assignments are printed on condoms," observed one guest.

The Brahmins and brand-name fortunes were out in full force, and it was easy to spot Cambridge art collector Susan Paine, eye-catching painter Stephanie Warburg and her mustachio'd muchacho, Jonathan, Pill Hill party pair Coco and Kyra Montague, gay (but not in the lesbian sense) divorcée Jennifer Donaldson, gay (in the homosexual sense) Peter Wheeler and his business partner, fashion designer Sara Campbell, swanlike socialites Leigh Denny, Shelly Nemirovsky and Glynis Gozigian, plus too many Fidelity Johnsons and blue-blooded Cabots to count (at least after a couple of cocktails).

As it turned out, the evening's best Palin joke was the one delivered during the keynote speech by Planned Parenthood's national president Cecile Richards, whose mother, former Texas governor Ann, famously said, "George Bush was born with a silver foot in his mouth":

"I'm pleased to report that since news of her teenaged daughter's pregnancy, we've received thousands of donations in Sarah Palin's honor." ×××

They've Got the Look

I always like to see what Amanda Knorr wears to work. She has great personal style, looking as natural in a pair of rubber Wellies as in over-the-knee leather boots. Today, she cinched a bulky sweater with a skinny belt to cute effect.

That sensibility proved useful as Amanda sorted nominations for our annual celebration of well-dressed Bostonians. The crew includes a Patriots linebacker, an Italian chef and a TV news anchor. Of course, clothing is personal. Just ask the couples who dissected each other's wardrobes this issue. Love can certainly be cruel.

To avoid such criticism, you could put your fashion fate in the hands of an expert. Ruth Basloe's story has everything you need to pull off country chic this season. Like Amanda, Ruth is an office inspiration, a woman who freely mixes animal and floral prints. I swear it makes sense.

PIC ME

EVERY GLOSSY FASHION photograph—whether it's of a wax-faced model in evening dress or a single well-turned sock—is the work of a stylist. Art directors and photographers may be the creative minds, but it's left to the stylist to select the perfect underpants, to drape the ideal scarf, to ruffle the exact crease. Lauren Franz is one such ruffler.

"I like to do it all," Franz says. "This week will be props. Last time we did swimwear."

A former model and manager at Louis Boston, she graduated to working behind the camera as a stylist for Team/the Agency. In addition to picking wardrobes for models, she arranges clothes for catalogs—"spreads with sweaters folded in a beautiful pile with pine cones." She likens this to art.

"I studied painting, and in a way, it's like creating a still life," says Franz, 27. Her years of modeling gave her an insider's perspective on fashion, but her own tastes didn't always err toward the classic. "I always had my own look," she says. "I always wore crazy colors and my mom cut my hair. I had knee socks when everyone was wearing tank jeans. I had to pull my pants up really high."

Franz has long since learned the stylist's tricks of making clothes look beautiful. "We use different types of stuffing," she says. "We use tape. We clip the backs of dresses. We cut the sleeves of sweaters so you can see the cuffs."

That's the philosophy of the stylist in a nutshell: "You manipulate."

Drink of the Moment

Frosty Pints

In a bygone era, a frozen malt sipped through two straws was the treat to share before a night of cruising and Everly Brothers tunes. Nowadays, it tends to come with hops (a word rarely preceded by sock). While the combination of beer and ice cream might conjure up images of Bud floats and other bad ideas, J.P. Licks founder Vince Petryk and his team have created three tasty blends for their new Oktoberfest series. Surely, they must have a high-tech flavor lab. "Yeah, it's called our downstairs kitchen," director of operations Kim Sawchuk says.

"I have no food degree, so a lot of this stuff is empirical," Petryk admits. "I kind of stumble around, but Sam Adams' descriptions of their beers [were] a wonderful road guide." Like a sommelier pairing food and wine, he strives to enhance a brew's core flavors in ice cream. In a milkshake ($5.62), the rugged Black Lager mellows against a rich chocolate base, as if the normally brutish beer met Colonel Pickering and learned to become a lady. The Irish Red keeps the ale's inspiration at the forefront, finishing with a buttery smoothness. Then there's the Cherry Wheat Sorbet's foundation. "That one is pretty damn obvious: There's cherries in them thar hills!" Petryk laughs. Light and icy, it's more Cherry Coke than Cherry Wheat, like something you'd get from a soda jerk and split with your steady.

Not Your Frat Boy's Wings

Finding a bar that serves hot wings is about as easy as, well, finding a bar. But finding a bar that has a fresh take on the standard pub fare is more difficult. Hence the crowds at Ecco, East Boston's latest—and hippest—bistro. Chef David Fitzgerald (formerly of Oxford Street Grill and Lynn Bistro) replaces the bucket of wings in greasy red sauce with a trio of sausage-stuffed fliers, slow-roasted and tossed in a punchy pepperoncini puree. They come on a bed of celery and crumbled Gorgonzola.

Question for Gia Veglia

What are the stranger requests you've received?

Gia Veglia co-owns Whaddya Need?, a North End business that provides general services.

1. A young lady called and asked us to walk her grandma around for exercise, because her mother had asked her to do it and she didn't want to. I asked her how her grandma felt about it. She replied, "Let me get back to you." An hour later, her mother rang us angry, telling us that grandma would be insulted. I agreed absolutely.

2. A middle-aged woman walked into our store one day and asked how much the evening would cost with my two male business-partners. One of them asked her what she needed done, as the rate varies based on the job. We don't have a price for what she wanted. We don't run a prostitution ring here!

3. We offer different maid-service items on a sushi-style menu, so you can pick and pay for exactly what you need. We never thought we would get calls for one item at a time, but we do—all the time. At least once a week Whaddya Need? goes to someone's home just to do a load of dishes or make a bed.

Going Out

FRENCH REVIVAL

Grabbing lunch at Sam LaGrassa's, Grotto owner Scott Herritt spotted an unexpected opportunity across the street. "I saw a 'For Lease' sign, but wasn't really looking to open another place," Herritt explains. "But once I learned about the history, I got excited about the whole thing."

The history of Marliave dates to 1885 when French immigrant Henry Marliave opened a restaurant on Bosworth Street to serve classic European and New England fare. As a nod to the past, and a cruel reminder of our current economic status, the redone space is decorated with memorabilia, like a copy of an 1894 chef's tasting menu—75 cents, with wine. The entire color scheme is subdued, from the understated oyster bar to the elegant dining room two floors above. "I went back to classics," Herritt says. "Everything is black or white. It's right or wrong, and we try and do things the right way."

For pub diners, that means presenting New England bar food with Italian and French accents, like a Yankee pot roast with short ribs ($18) and the Mister Marliave, a croque monsieur with Gruyère cheese ($9). The approach is more refined upstairs, as demonstrated by the rabbit ($39), consisting of a black-truffle–stuffed leg and a prosciutto-wrapped loin separated onto two plates. "I'm trying to present the ingredients in their perfect form," Herritt explains.

At the bar, Marliave sticks to its classic roots. "If people want raspberry vodka, we muddle raspberries and vodka," Herritt declares. With a road-map–sized menu, drinks pay homage to Boston history. For example, there's the John Boyle O'Reilly ($10). Named for the poet and city editor who frequented the place, it's a blend of Irish whiskey, Bärenjäger and grapefruit, and another example of how the current Marliave honors its past.

FOOD FIGHT

TO THE TAQUERIA EMPLOYEE who never gets my order right:
What's so hard to understand? I get the same thing every Tuesday afternoon: a super bean and rice burrito with NO SALSA. Hear that? No salsa, none, not even a drop. It's a simple request, but somehow you manage to complicate things. Maybe you don't remember my rant two weeks ago about my absolute hatred for all things cilantro, but you continue to pile on the salsa verde like a linebacker on a loose football. I don't care if you like it, it still tastes like soap to me. I never thought I'd say this, but Taco Bell sounds pretty good right now.

Steve from Brighton

Dear extremely talented falafel man:

I wanted to thank you for creating the best falafel I've ever had the pleasure of tasting. The chickpea, black bean and onion emulsion was perfection, and I truly appreciate the extra effort you took to make the wrap so nice and toasty. Although you freaked me out a little bit with your massive unibrow and excessively chapped lips, there is no doubt about it, you are a master of your craft. That falafel was a godsend! Its warm goodness kept my belly full for hours, and I have already recommended your magic to several of my coworkers. I look forward to seeing you soon. Keep up the good work!

Jackson

To Guapo's dad:

I met you and your adorable English bulldog on the Common on a Sunday. You were standing by a lemonade cart when my bull mastiff, Zoe, was a little too aggressive and scared poor Guapo. Sorry about that! She gets a little jumpy around new dogs, but she really is a sweetie. Once they calmed down a bit, you and I got to talking, and you seemed like a very nice guy. You worked in the restaurant industry; you had blond hair and red shoelaces. Our conversation was sadly broken up when a squirrel caught Zoe's eye, and she dragged me to the other side of the park. I just moved to Boston from Arizona, and I don't know many people, but I would love the chance to meet up again. I know Zoe misses Guapo, and it would be a shame to keep them apart! Please let me know if you want to get together for another stroll or maybe even a drink.

Beauty

THE SKINNY ON CHOCOLATE

When I was a girl, my mom warned me about the effects of junk food on my complexion. So it was with some trepidation that I scheduled a chocolate lift facial at Violet Skin Boutique on Newbury Street. According to the shop, the treatment increases circulation and tightens pores. While my face soaked up its dessert, I chose a corresponding chocolate oil for an upper-body massage. Even after cleansing, my skin smelled good enough to eat. I'm not suggesting you hurry home and slather yourself in melted Hershey bars, but the facial—also available at Violet's new Coolidge Corner location—discredits mom's advice (this once).

MAKING WAVES

On a sex scandal and ship models

A Fateful Day

HOW BRIEF IS PLEASURE—especially when it's captured on video and made public. In Anita Shreve's latest novel, the prep-school basketballers who collectively get it on with a sexy, confused, fragile, 14-year-old girl aren't the only ones who bear the shocked-face brunt of this erotic tumble. Silas, a local farm boy recruited by the headmaster and left seething after a traumatic discovery, recklessly enters into the fateful hookup. So does a brainy student headed for Brown. And then there's the postgrad who's 19. The aftershocks radiate everywhere. The headmaster loses his job, and those videotaped moments freeze and derail the teenage students from the expected trajectory of their futures. Shreve flexibly adopts many viewpoints to show us how a moment that could have and should have remained hypnotically and deliciously pure devolves into a scandal.

Testimony by Massachusetts author Anita Shreve is about a sex scandal at a prep school. This is her fourteenth book.

SAIL AND WELL MET LANNAN'S MANY MODELS

Ship Right

SOMEWHERE BETWEEN the joy of being a kid with toy vessels and a grown-up sailor who wants to bring the high seas indoors, the Lannan Ship Model Gallery celebrates the beauty of boats and their sails. Large-rigged models of clipper ships, with sails billowing ever-downward like some beautiful gown, and gaff-rigged schooners, with their triangular-shaped sails stretching fore and aft, often commemorate famous boats. Richly expansive sails are found on square riggers, while a pure, single sail is displayed on others. John F. Kennedy's yacht, the Victura, is commemorated. The gallery also sells paintings, and an enormous black-and-white photograph places you on the tippy side of a huge sailboat, forever at the whooshing edge of the ocean. Antique nautical paraphernalia, like telescopes, figureheads, large-standing navigational binnacles and ships' wheels that become tables, look salty and muscular in the home.

Lannan Ship Model Gallery (99 High St., Boston, 617-451-2650, lannangallery.com) sells models, antiques and other items.

Purveyors

Watertown's Wealth

One block, three markets, at least a dozen takes on baklava. Tidy rows of tangy dolma. Stacks of lahmejune rounds speckled with bits of spiced lamb. Bin after bin of mixed nuts, including hard-to-find smoked almonds, fresh pistachios and raw filberts. Shelves piled high with bagged spices, the warm scents of cardamom, cumin, cinnamon and pulverized chiles tempting the senses. Oh, and lots of available parking.

Behold East Watertown's hidden gem, a cluster of Armenian food purveyors. This stretch of Mt. Auburn Street gets none of the gushy hype lavished on neighboring Tremont, Hanover and Beach streets, but the fresh pastries, aisles of imported nonperishables and abundant selection of prepared mezze claim their own following.

A cornerstone of the town, Arax Market devotes an entire case to fresh feta in addition to offering bargains on hookahs, saffron threads and rose-petal jam. Massis Bakery is best known for countless types of fresh-baked lahmejune; a closer look reveals puff pastry, keyma beef and frogs' legs. Sevan Bakery deserves its reputation for crisp, melt-in-your-mouth pistachio baklava, and no trip is complete without a loaf of sweet choreg, a handful of sugar-coated chick peas and a savory basterma-stuffed pastry. Finally, cross the street to Fastachi and grab some roasted nuts for the ride home. ELIZABETH BOMZE

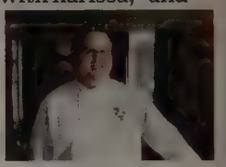
IN TOUCH WITH HIS INNARD CHEF

Jamie Bissonnette goes to Toro.

YOUR TYPICAL steakhouse chef doesn't write a menu that includes a $34 entree of crispy pork belly with polenta, roasted garlic and clams. Then again, Jamie Bissonnette isn't your typical steakhouse chef, which explains the dish at KO Prime and Bissonnette's decision to move to the South End to man the kitchen at Toro.

"I was kinda bored," he says. Ken Oringer, Toro's owner and Bissonnette's longtime friend, offered him a position with lots of appeal: the opportunity to focus on the rustic foods he loves; proximity to his wife, Courtney, who is Toro's bar manager; and collaboration with Oringer on other projects. "We're planning to open other restaurants in the future," Bissonnette says.

Once he's at Toro, diners can expect "a Moorish influence, merguez with harissa," and an "offal and charcuterie section" on the menu. In the meantime, his sous chef, Josh Buehler, will take over at KO Prime.



WHEN TEN TABLES IN JAMAICA PLAIN celebrates its sixth birthday on Dec. 6, owner Krista Kranyak anticipates another milestone: the imminent opening of Ten Tables Cambridge. Kranyak doesn't want to reveal the precise location until every detail is finalized but promises that it will "still be small and intimate." As her business partner there, Ten Tables chef David Punch will "float between the two spots."

IN RELATED NEWS (wink wink), the restaurant formerly known as Craigie Street Bistrot will re-open in the old La Groceria space on Main Street in Cambridge around mid-November.

AND THEN THERE WERE TROIS... By the time you read this, Jacky Robert will have opened another Petit Robert Bistro in the quiet town of Needham. Making no concessions to timid suburban palates, PRB3 will feature the same menu as its predecessors in Kenmore Square and the South End. Bring on the frogs' legs!

COOKING OUTSIDE THE BOKX

Hotel Indigo's restaurant has a way with seafood and service.

WELL-PLATED Scallops with fennel and tobiko

PEOPLE ASK ME WHAT criteria determine the selection of restaurants for review in this column. I try to write about new spots, but not spots so new that they haven't had the time to work out the bugs (whoops, bad metaphor). Sometimes I cover established places that have undergone substantial renovations, hired a different chef, or moved into new and grander quarters. Occasionally I report on a hidden gem that deserves better recognition. And generally, I confine myself to areas accessible by the T.

Just meeting this last condition, Bokx 109 occupies the lower level of the Hotel Indigo, a chic transformation of a former Holiday Inn up the hill from Riverside Station at the end of the D Green Line. In contrast with the trendy glitz of some of the hotel's other public spaces, the restaurant's refined decor features handsome mahogany tables, wood paneling, leather banquettes, translucent black draperies and soft lighting. An open kitchen showcases the purposeful activity of a talented staff turning out superior, often superb food.

On our first visit, house-made focaccia, Iggy's classic baguettes and sweet butter relieved the urgency of our hunger. An appetizer of about two dozen mussels ($12) nearly blew me away. The mollusks swam in a tomato broth, enlivened with jalapeño and punctuated with thin slices of smoky linguica, crisp croutons protruding like the vertical supports of a jetty. Three crab cakes ($16) rivaled the mussels in portion size and flavor; careful sauteing preserved the cakes' moist texture, while the crisp apple/celery slaw garnish provided a welcome counterpoint. A third seafood appetizer, calamari frito misto ($12), combined flash-fried Point Judith squid with smoky piquillo pepper sauce, green beans and chilies so fiery that it took several minutes to resuscitate my taste buds. In contrast, Bokx's "pork 'n beans" ($9)—pork belly with a small crock of baked beans in a rich barbecue sauce—soothed and satisfied.

Among the main courses, the New England seafood chowder ($27) took top honors, with a generous slab of fresh cod, four large sea scallops, onions, potatoes and corn in an extravagant cream sauce. Almost its peer was the poulet rouge ($28), a red-wine–dressed, roasted half-chicken accompanied by slender green and yellow beans, slices of earthy mushrooms and small onions. Rack of lamb ($40) featured two double ribs of Colorado lamb, perfectly grilled to medium rare and faultlessly tender, with a giant rosemary leaf and sweet, luscious figs. Compared to the size of the other portions, the ribs seemed a trifle skimpy.

The kitchen further manifested its skillfulness in the pan-roasted sea scallops ($28), five large beauties garnished with mellow fennel and a sprinkling of Japanese tobiko. The least successful (and, ironically, most expensive) main course, a Flintstone rib-eye steak ($45), looked more impressive on the bone than off. Thinner than anticipated, the steak lacked the succulent texture I associate with rib eye, but there was no denying its good, beefy flavor. It's one of six available cuts, with accompanying sauces that include Narragansett Brew and Porcini Bearnaise. Bokx's fries ($10) also came multiple ways: flavored with truffle oil; seasoned with rosemary; or infused with smoky paprika. Listed as an appetizer rather than a side, the fries were almost a meal in themselves.

TASTY TRIO The flavored fries almost make a meal.

2006 Erath pinot noir

Most portions were so substantial that dessert seemed superfluous. Red velvet cupcakes ($12) with mascarpone frosting, fudgsicle ice cream and cotton candy—strong on whimsy but short on merit—didn't change our minds. Bokx's wine choices, on the other hand, lent singular distinction to this engaging eatery. The 2006 Altocedro Argentine malbec ($35) charmed with fruity flavor and food-friendly acidity. The 2006 Erath pinot noir ($36) from Oregon's Willamette Valley boasted classic Burgundy character, elegance and finesse, as well as a seductive bouquet and a gentle price. The waiter actually down-sold the wine list, recommending the Erath over a New Zealand pinot noir that cost $10 more! In fact, the staff's informed professionalism and pleasant demeanor enhanced our dining experience immeasurably. ×××

On Sept. 18 Red Sox wives Jacque Francona and Kelli Pedroia hosted the "I Have Nothing to Wear" benefit for the Kids Clothes Club, a charity providing warm winter coats to needy children. Guests shopped at sponsoring Newbury and Charles street stores and then met for a party at the Liberty Hotel. Three hundred people attended the event, which raised $50,000.

On Sept. 27 the "Big Dreams Start Small" Denise Hajjar fashion show for St. Jude Children's Research Hospital brought 600 people to the Marriott Copley Place. Mayor Tom Menino received the event's 2008 Big Dreamer Award for his commitment to improving children's lives. The benefit raised more than $200,000.

LESS IS MORE

Minimalism is the new excess.

LET'S TALK ABOUT MONEY. Money seems to be on everybody's mind these days, ever since Al Qaeda and Saddam Hussein planted toxic derivatives in our portfolios and Iran devalued my property by purchasing the house next door and then failing to mow the lawn or do the least bit of upkeep. You're sneaky, Iran!

It's time to stop assigning blame and to change our behavior. Your fiscal approach during this economic crisis, like most things, can be described in a fishing metaphor. Normally, you'd dig up some worms and put them on a hook with the hope of catching a fish; you risk losing your worms, but the minimal initial investment may translate into a big, lucrative fish. In the current climate, you might worry about losing your worms and not catching a fish, in which case you could play it safe and eat the worms yourself. You'd negate your risk, and, while a worm doesn't taste as good as a fish, it's still better than going hungry. Of course, I'm not saying that people should dig up worms and eat them. Freeze them to eat later on, when nobody has any food because of the financial crisis.

Americans as a whole should adopt a few creative strategies to supplement their incomes. Mortgage-backed securities might be passé, but you know what never goes out of fashion? Selling your blood. Which makes it that much cheaper to get your blood-alcohol level high enough to erase the crushing misery of your debt-ridden life. Reality check, people: It's time to refute the symbols of July 2008's profligacy. We're no longer impressed by your fancy watch, your vast lawn, your prestigious extra kidney. Think about that last one—is a second kidney really necessary? How often have you used the spare tire on your car? I mean, before it got repossessed.

Minimalism is the new excess. Consider becoming a hipster; you can wear strange clothes from Goodwill and nobody will give you funny looks. You'll have to buy a very expensive fixed-gear bicycle, but that purchase will stimulate the economy, giving someone else the money to buy tight jeans. All of these transactions will be taxed, thus funding the bailout, helping keep our money worth somewhat more than Zimbabwe's.

After we spend enough on Pabst Blue Ribbon, the economy recovers.

Eventually, after we spend enough on Pabst Blue Ribbon and skinny neckties, the economy recovers.

Until then, subtle changes in your spending habits can mean more money in your pocket, because every dollar you don't spend is about $1.30 you won't need to panhandle (assuming that you pay taxes on your panhandling income). For example, if you're used to buying expensive bottled water, try being thirsty. If you subscribe to premium cable channels, you can cancel those once you're in prison. And if you normally drive a car to your job, switch up your routine by riding a bike to the corner, where you can sell drugs and your body. See, it's not that hard!

Other so-called experts will tell you that, with interest rates likely to rise, paying down your credit card debt is more important than ever. I say you shouldn't worry too much, because your credit card company is probably going to go out of business anyway. And then wouldn't you feel foolish?

Here's another tip for dealing with personal debt: They make it pretty hard to go from Mexico to the United States, but not the other way around. Haven't you always wanted to experience a new culture? Just don't google "faking your own death and fleeing to Mexico to avoid creditors," unless you use your friend's computer and then take it for collateral to get your tamale stand off the ground. I've watched enough 20/20 to know you should never google anything except "clean healthy living for the good of society," and even that's risky. But what are you gonna do, try Yahoo? Don't make me laugh.

Everyone wants to know if things are going to get worse, and pundits disagree about whether we've hit bottom. Which makes me laugh, frankly, because people in suits are using the phrase "hit bottom" and worrying about Fannie and saying that the monster bubble is behind us. Hey, maybe we should replace Hank Paulson with Treasury Secretary Mix-a-Lot, who, if he saw a monster bubble, would pull up quick to get wit' it.

These are unprecedented times, but as a country, we've faced worse. We need to get back into our routine, which means paying inordinate attention to topics that are of marginal importance at best. Here's what I know: In 2007, Congress was busy grilling baseball players about steroids, and Goldman Sachs made a record profit. Right now, Congress is worried about the economy, and Wall Street is completely on the skids. Where are you when we need you, Jose Canseco? ✖✖✖

COMMON SENSE

Practical money (and life) advice for these dangerous times

Burn, baby, burn!

WHEN I'M NOT WRITING, I actually manage money for a living. And it occurred to me that in this dangerous climate, some common sense advice might be helpful for you. Before I was a contributor at this magazine, it chose me as Boston's Best investment advisor. Barron's picked me as one of the top 100 advisors in America two years ago. I recognize and agree that all lists are bogus, subjective and open to manipulation. That being said, anxiety about our economic future has reached heights I haven't seen since the gas lines and 20 percent interest levels of the 1970s. Many of you spend whatever isn't taxed and skip deductions for retirement. But all of you younger than 45 should think about something that may be unfamiliar: savings. I know, it's boring. But I believe in the true F-word: Freedom. Freedom is what everyone who comes to see me in my office really wants, and what so few people have. Because we're now living longer than ever before, you'll need greater funds in your eventual retirement. Here are some of my rules for managing your money, particularly if you're young:

1). If you're under 45, take this approach to your 401(k) plans: Aim for growth and keep it simple—50 percent domestic growth funds, 50 percent international growth. Go for the gold early in life; a terrible cycle in the stock market means that your invested dollars turn into cheaper valuations. Time will bail you out and reward that disciplined investing when most people around you feel fearful.

2). Be a contrarian when you're young. Bet against the crowd, in investing and in life. Don't be a headline reader, because headlines seldom get it right. In my opinion, many of America's best companies are on the bargain counter, and many pay dividends comparable to 10-year Treasury yields. Dividends do count in your total return; don't ignore them. And remember that the biggest gains in real estate and in stocks are in the long term, not in short-term trading. Stop looking at your accounts daily. Save, and concentrate on your career and hobbies.

3). As an adjunct to mutual funds or exchange traded funds (ETFs), think about a concept I have long advocated: using concentration, not diversification, to build net worth over time. This concept runs contrary to current popular asset-allocation planning but goes back to my freedom theme. Identify and Identify and pick one or two companies that you really believe in.

pick one or two companies that you really believe in for the future. Perhaps it's Apple, or Google, or Target. And give yourself three good reasons why this stock would be something worth holding and adding to for years. Warren Buffett, arguably the best investor of the past five decades, has concentrated his picks in companies he feels offer products and services that we'll always want, like Gillette (now Proctor & Gamble) razor blades, American Express credit cards, GEICO insurance and Johnson & Johnson Band Aids. And he holds his positions for years. That's how you get the really long run in stocks, and how you build wealth. I call these choices your "stake in life" stocks. And when markets are fearful, like now, you add to these holdings. You don't panic out of them. Be disciplined in your "stake in life" companies. They do have the ability to change your life, if you give them time.

4). Here are some last words for planning your future, financially and otherwise: All life is relationships. Learn this early. I have three rules for establishing relationships in the legal, financial and medical fields:

a). Stay in touch with your past. Go to your high-school and college reunions, and network. People tend to embrace and respond to others from their childhood. A grammar-school classmate was our plumber for many years; he would prioritize us any time we had a problem.

b). Have something to trade. Use your expertise or knowledge to appeal to others, who will respond to you. Try getting an appointment with a dermatologist or a podiatrist during the holiday season, and a doctor's office tells you, "We can see you May 15." You could be in a coma by May. I have googled doctors to find out their hobbies and interests. When I learned that one collected satirical drawings, I told his receptionist that I knew something about the drawings of Daumier, an obscure French satirist. She got me in the next day.

"Okay," he said, "What do you know about the artist that no one else does?"

"I know that mentioning his name could get me an early appointment." He laughed and became a friend. Have something to trade.

c). Make yourself memorable. I had a friend who traveled New England by car as a salesman. Everywhere he stopped, he passed out Tootsie Rolls to receptionists, and he always got an audience because everyone remembered him. In an increasingly anonymous world, try to personalize your life as much as possible. We need each other. ×××

The School of Sports { RICH LEVINE }

ON RODNEY, ROOKIES, MANNY AND MASTERSON

5 PIECES OF RED SOX HARDWARE

MVP: Dustin Pedroia might win the AL MVP, but—considering Beckett's struggles—the Sox don't have a shot without Jon Lester. At this point there are only three lefties in baseball—Johan Santana, Cole Hamels and David Price—we'd rather build a team around. We're so hyped about Lester's future, we don't even remember how to spell Buchholz.... Except for this one time.

The "Einhorn is Finkel" Biggest Surprise Award: When Justin Masterson made his debut, he looked straight out of a Frosted Mini-Wheats commercial. His hat was too big, his uniform a little baggy; Masterson tiptoed around the mound like he was afraid to mess up the dirt. By October, he was a 6'6", 250-pound monster—and the kid in him wanted to saw your bat off with a fastball. We expected him to be good, just not this quickly.

The Seinfeld Finale Award for Disappointment: It'd be sad to see him go, but is anyone prepared for another season of Jason Varitek at-bats? Sure, there were off-field issues that contributed to his troubles, but in reality, Tek hasn't hit since 2005. And despite that rare ability to manage a staff, the Sox had a four-plus team-ERA in '08—somehow, eight other teams did better, without having Varitek behind the plate.

Most Valuable Quadriceps: If Julio Lugo's quads don't go out, Jed Lowrie spends another year in the minors and doesn't establish himself as the serviceable SS and/or legitimate trade bait that he is today. Lugo's quads are the (very) poor man's version of Drew Bledsoe's sternum. They're the best that $36 million can buy.

The Roy Jones Jr. Award: Dustin Pedroia's pound-for-pound the best player in baseball, and his potential's reached Rajon Rondo status. There's no ceiling on where his career can go. Can he win multiple batting titles while averaging 200 hits, 100 runs, 20 homers and 20 stolen bases for the next five years? Sure, why not? Although maybe we're better off telling Pedey that he can't do it.

3 Deep Thoughts

BY CELTICS ROOKIE BILL WALKER

On his past knee problems... "I'm at 100 percent right now. Physically and mentally. I've been working out with [C's trainer] Brian Doo every day since I've been here and making sure every part of my body is right. I'm ready to go."

On dropping into the second round of the draft... "I'll always have that. That extra drive... knowing that everyone passed up on me the first time around. It's going to be there when I'm working on my game and in the weight room. And it'll end up making me a better player."

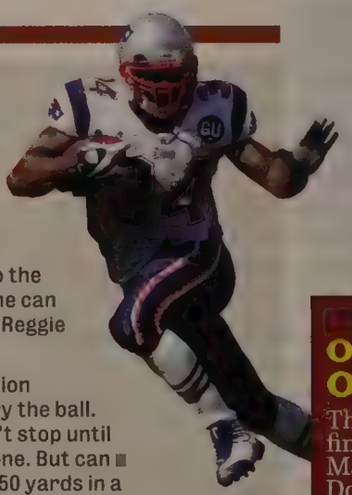
On life as a rookie... "As a student of the game, and a fan of the game, it's great getting out with pros like KG, Paul and Ray. You learn real quickly about all that they have to offer from being in and around this league."

2 EARLY TESTS FOR THE CELTICS

Oct. 28 vs. Cleveland Boston teams are 5-0 on Ring Night in the "Duck Boat Era," and not even LeBron can stop the Celtics from making it six for six. After the game, Delonte West is asked how it felt to see his former teammates honored: "Man, we see cats and dogs fightin' each other damn near every day, but what you gonna say when the llamas start tryin' to get in on that?" Pick: Celtics, 92-81

Nov. 4 at Houston The revamped Rockets take revenge on the Celtics—who ended Houston's historic 22-game win streak last season—but the victory is overshadowed by Ron Artest's postgame announcement that his next album will feature a track in which he raps over a loop of Dikembe Mutombo singing the national anthem. Pick: Rockets, 95-88

4 PATRIOTS IN FOCUS



Strong on Safety... Rodney Harrison and opposing receivers typically mix about as well as Diet Coke and Mentos, but it's been a while since No. 37 really introduced someone to the turf. The Pats defense needs a spark, and no one can provide that better than Harrison. Torry Holt, Reggie Wayne, Lee Evans: You've been warned.

Slam 'Em Sammy... There's a simple satisfaction that comes from watching Sammy Morris carry the ball. He runs fast, he runs straight and his legs won't stop until there's a 300-pounder wrapped around each one. But can a 31-year-old back who's never run more than 550 yards in a season carry a team into the playoffs? Let's hope so.

Down on the Corner... Love him or hate him, it's time for Ellis Hobbs to walk the walk. The mission is simple: Find the other team's No. 1 and shut him down like it's 2 am. Throw in a couple decent returns, and we'll consider letting him reclaim the Hollywood Hobbs moniker. Until then, Rotmans Home Furniture will have to do.

Crazy With the Calls... The Pats have succeeded with a less-than-explosive offense before, thanks in large part to Charlie Weis' creativity. So would OC Josh McDaniel maybe benefit from a call to Robert Parish's old delivery guy and a few hours alone with the playbook? We're pretty sure that's how Jeff Fisher drew up the Music City Miracle.

1 ONE WORD ON NO. 99

The honeymoon's finally over for Manny and the Dodgers—and we couldn't be happier. So, what comes next? Maybe he accuses Joe Torre of inappropriate touching. Or how about he claims that the traffic in L.A. doesn't respect him. Hey, whatever helps justify signing with the Yankees this winter, right?

STELLA ARTOIS

Perfection HAS ITS PLACE

A perfectly poured Stella Artois is the Gold Standard of Belgian beer.

Step One THE PURIFICATION

The bartender selects the signature glass for the beer being poured. The glass is scrubbed in a cool-water bath, preferably with a mild detergent. It's then rinsed with cold water to chill the glass.

Step Two THE SACRIFICE

The tap is opened in one swift motion to let the first burst of foam flow away. It must never enter the glass, thus ensuring every drop of beer is fresh.

Step Three THE LIQUID ALCHEMY

The glass is held at a 45-degree angle to create the perfect balance of liquid to foam.

Step Four THE HEAD

The head is created by straightening and lowering the glass. The foam is visually appealing and releases the beer's aroma.

Step Five THE REMOVAL

The bartender closes the tap in one quick action and moves the glass away from the faucet to ensure no drops spoil the perfect head.

Step Six THE BEHEADING

While the beer is flowing over the edge of the glass, the bartender cuts the head gently with a head cutter at a 45-degree angle. This eliminates the larger bubbles that burst easily and accelerate the dissipation of the head.

Step Seven THE JUDGMENT

The bartender now stands in judgment. The beer's head should be two fingers thick.

Step Eight THE CLEANSING

The bartender then rinses the bottom and sides of the glass. This keeps the glass clean and cool and makes it comfortable to hold.

Step Nine THE BESTOWAL

A perfectly poured pint of Belgian beer is presented with the logos of the coaster and glass facing the customer.

"I think Botox will probably enter my life, and we'll have a nice relationship."

Soroff On CHRISTY SCOTT CASHMAN

The Back Bay beauty chats about plastic surgery, owning an island and her favorite John Irving novel.

WRITER, ACTOR, PRODUCER Christy Scott Cashman was born as one of 10 children in the Smoky Mountains of North Carolina. Cashman, 37, moved to Los Angeles at an early age to pursue acting, with feature film roles in Edge of Darkness, The Women and The Maiden Heist. She currently costars with Debbie DiMasi (wife of Massachusetts speaker of the House Sal) on the monthly NECN show Open Book Club, where they interview best-selling authors like Dennis Lehane. As president of Saint Aire Productions, Cashman produces and develops TV and feature-film projects; she's also active with several festivals/foundations. She's married to construction mogul Jay Cashman, and they have two young sons. The family divides its time between a home in the Back Bay and a private island off of Cape Cod.

Jonathan Soroff: So you're this gorgeous powerhouse. Do other women hate you?
Christy Scott Cashman: Well, they should. No, I think it's funny to hear that because, of course, your perception of yourself is always different than what people think about you. I will always feel like an awkward teenager.

You and Debbie DiMasi have been criticized as well-connected dilettantes. Rebuttal?
Can't someone be wealthy and attractive and still have ambition?

What are you reading right now?
Junot Díaz, The Brief Wondrous Life of Oscar Wao. He's our next interviewee. I love the way he writes.

Most interesting writer you've met?
John Irving. He's like a literary god, and I so respect A Prayer For Owen Meany. That remains at the top of my favorite books.

Aside from him, three favorite writers?
Mark Twain. I tend to like the classics, especially children's literature, because the writing is so descriptive. I'd also say Jack London, not that he was a children's writer, but I just finished reading my kids The Call of the Wild. It deals with life and death and good and evil but in a way that doesn't make you feel lectured. I like Ian McEwan. But I guess I'll go with JD Salinger. I know it sounds like a high-school reading list.

How much do you read?
I read a lot of books, but do they really stick with me? Do they really have something to say? Or do I feel that was a really special piece of art? Not often.

PHOTOGRAPH BY A. Scott/Patrick McMullan

Are women kind or bitchy to each other?
In general, bitchy. I think that we have a few close-knit friends that we are nice to and understand and take the time to try and understand. But the friends on the periphery, we tend to be more judgmental about.

You've been involved in 14 feature films. At what point do you say, "Enough is enough?"
Do you mean resign yourself to being a bit player? Never. What I love is creating stories.

Does it help that you don't need to worry about money?
Of course, it does. But I also feel like people think you can't have an edge if you're OK monetarily, and there's nothing further from the truth. Once you don't need to worry about money, you've got to search your soul. If you're not doing that, you can't be in the arts. If you don't want that, you'd better be content with having a lot of money. If that was all that was important, I wouldn't be sitting here doing an interview or trying to do anything else. I'd be fine taking my kids to school and then going to get my nails done.

How important is material stuff?
I'd be lying if I said the stuff wasn't important, because once you have it, it all of a sudden becomes important. But I think that if my kids are healthy, and I'm healthy, and my family and friends are OK, it's a real blessing to get up every day and pursue what you want without the distractions of having to worry about all that. I could do that with or without an island, with or without a big house in the Back Bay. But is it nice? Of course.

Do you like your looks?
Yeah, I'm comfortable with them. I always see room for improvement. I haven't yet done the plastic surgery thing, which doesn't mean I'm not going to. I think Botox will probably enter my life, and we'll have a nice relationship within the next five years. [Chuckles.] And I might even get my boobs done!

Biggest beauty secret?
Omega-3 for the skin. I take it religiously.

Where do you get your nails done?
Anywhere that'll take me on Newbury Street where I won't get a fungus.

Think you'll ever be tapped to play Sarah Palin in a biopic?
[Laughs.] Oh, yeah. Because I can do that accent.

Dream role?
I want to do a Western, so I could show off my horseback-riding ability. I'd love to play Annie Oakley, 'cause I can also shoot a gun.

Most embarrassing audition?
When I was fresh out in L.A. I didn't know my ass from my elbow. So I found an audition in the newspaper and got all excited until I got there and found out it was strictly African-Americans they were looking for. They said, "Do you still want to do your monologue?" and I said, "Sure!" So I did it, and they suffered through it and I was on my way. But what's so funny is that I actually remember thinking, "I wonder if they'll like me so much they'll give me the part, and I'll play a black character." [Laughs.] Those are the thoughts you have as a young, moronic person with stars in your eyes.

Biggest weakness?
Which one? As an actor, you're always insecure about something.

Greatest strength as a person?
I'd venture to say compassion, because... I hesitate to say so, but maybe from experiencing my mom dying when I was 17. It makes you automatically see people not just as they are at the moment you're talking [with them] but as having traveled some kind of path to get there. ✖✖✖

10 with Style

They'll make you do a double take.

By Amanda Knorr
Photographs by Jörg Meyer

With one yellow Wellie planted on the curb, I hail a cab on Charles Street on a recent rainy day. "Wow! I like your boots," the driver says as I slide onto the leather seat. Like a bearded fashion-fairy godmother, he starts sounding off on the importance of style. "Fashion is exciting," he extols. "It creates response."

Moral of the story? Great style can stir up a reaction in anyone, not just Vogue worshippers. I like to measure it by the double take—when an outfit is so distinct it merits a second glance. And remember, it's not about being trendy; parachute pants and pegged jeans should probably be left to the professionals.

For this issue, I found 10 Bostonians whose personal tastes transcend what's in, and asked them about their icons and the contents of their closets. While their answers vary, they agree that style is unique to the individual. It might also be the only thing a Patriots linebacker and a 20-year-old art student have in common.

NAME:
Adalius Thomas

PROFESSION:
New England Patriots linebacker

HOMETOWN:
Nixburg, Ala.

CURRENT RESIDENCE:
Attleboro, Mass.

How would you describe your style?
Versatile.

How does your style reflect your personality?
It's the ability to adapt to any environment. I [also] like to show big guys have style, too.

Where do you like to shop in Boston?
It's my second season in New England, but I'm still learning my way around. I'm open to suggestions.

Favorite designers?
My suit guy: Chris Ahern.

What do you tend to focus on in your wardrobe?
Shoes and shades.

What items get you the most compliments?
My shoes and my shades.

Describe your perfect shopping day.
Finding my size in more than one store. [Adalius is 6'2", 270 pounds.]

Who are your style icons and why?
Jay-Z and Diddy, because they're both suit and jean types.

What was your biggest fashion blunder?
I hope I haven't had one.

Items in your closet you can't live without?
My shoes and my jeans.

What's your go-to outfit?
Any one of my suits.

What do you save on?
Jewelry.

What do you splurge on?
Suits. My father always said that people never stare at a guy who's overdressed.

Trend you hate?
European-cut jeans. I just don't have the body for tight-fitted clothes. For some people, it looks fine. I'm too big for it.

True or false: People are born with style?
False.

NAME:
Amelia Hughes

PROFESSION:
Wine consultant–turned accessories entrepreneur–turned loft interior designer–turned savior of shelter cats. Seriously.

HOMETOWN:
Upper Michigan

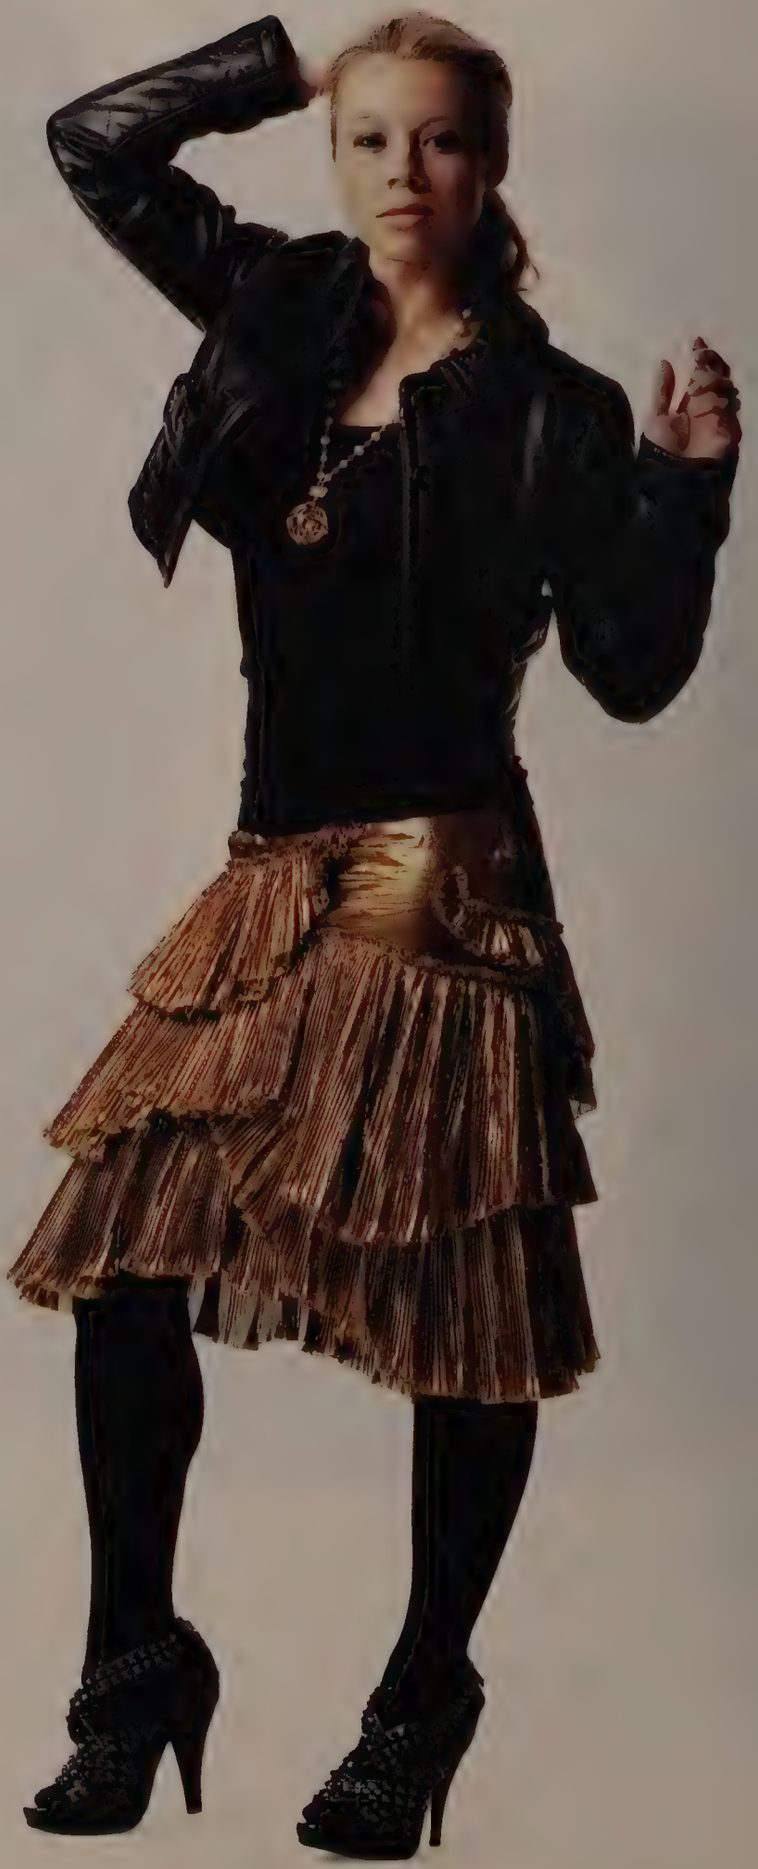
Boston



How would you describe your style?
Eclectic and conflicted. Say Kate Moss, Grace Kelly and Peter O'Toole (in character as Lawrence of Arabia) walk into a bar.

Where do you shop in Boston?
Barneys, Burberry, Louis Boston, Stel's and Dress.

What items get you the most compliments?
My dark blue, beat-up Chloé riding boots and a pair of flat, knee-high red vintage boots I picked up at the Rose Bowl flea market in L.A. I also get a lot of interest in accessories picked up on my travels—like a carved stone necklace I got in Cairo and a super-soft antelope-hair scarf I picked up in Istanbul.

What was your biggest fashion blunder?
Pretty much everything I wore between 1986 and 2002.

Items in your closet you can't live without?
I could live without any of it, and I remind myself of that when I am coaxing one of three precocious cats away from the closet door. To answer the question, though, my chocolate-brown Givenchy bag and my blue Goyard tote bag.

What's your go-to outfit?
It starts with a great scarf or necklace and my Chloé riding boots. Then I will either put on my Vanessa Bruno black shift dress and my Topshop tights or a pair of skinny jeans and a T Luxury T-shirt or Burberry men's sweater.

What do you save on?
I look at my lust list each season, select a few high-end pieces and think about how I would wear them and then start tracking them through sale time.

Trend you hate?
Anything deemed a trend. Buying into the trend machine would compel me to fill my closet with items that I will regret buying sooner than later. I'd rather have a smaller closet of things that will last longer and I love.

True or false: People are born with style?
False. People with a great sense of style are those with a great sense of self, and that usually involves the passage of time and life experiences.

NAME:
Dante deMagistris

PROFESSION:
Chef/owner of dante

HOMETOWN:
Belmont, Mass.

CURRENT RESIDENCE:
Boston

How would you describe your style?
It's a versatile mix of what's hip today, blended with timeless Italian classics and functionality. Hmm, sounds a bit like how I describe my food.

Where do you shop in Boston?
My friends at Riccardi and Barneys make it nice and easy one-stop shopping for me, and I always get what I like.

Favorite designers?
Franceschini, a designer in Rome with the perfect take on classic Italian men's styles.

What items get you the most compliments?
My Locman watches.

What was your biggest fashion blunder?
In fifth grade I was very excited about a shirt I picked out for a dance. It was a pink and light-blue mesh tank-top that I wore with parachute pants. It probably wouldn't have been bad because that was fashionable at the time, but little did I know it wasn't a normal school dance; it was a square dance.

What do you save on?
T-shirts. I can't see spending $350 for a T-shirt at the places I would normally shop, so I buy fitted Ts from Banana Republic. I also buy my boxer briefs from H&M.

What do you splurge on?
Everything else.

Current obsession in your wardrobe.
A pair of handmade socks that my mom knitted for me. I wear them so often that I will sometimes wash them by hand if I don't have enough dirty clothes to do a load of laundry. I'm actually looking forward to the colder weather so I can wear a hat that she made for me.

Trend you hate?
There's nothing I hate; as long as you're happy wearing it, then I'm happy for you. Although I would most definitely, never, ever wear a Nantucket red polo. At least it's contained to one island, but I still wonder, Why won't that look ever die?

True or false: People are born with style.
False. It's creativity that you're born with and that determines where you go with your style.

How would you describe your style?
Elegant chic.

How does your style reflect your personality?
My tastes are those of a creative yet grounded personality.

Where do you like to shop in Boston?
Barneys and Neiman Marcus.

Favorite designers?
Loro Piana, Brioni, Etro, Dior.

What do you tend to focus on in your wardrobe?
I have an outerwear obsession, and I love fine shoes.

What items get you the most compliments?
Suits and ties.

Describe your perfect shopping day.
Espresso at the South End Buttery. Neiman's in the late morning. Lunch at Sofra. Barneys in the afternoon. A nap.

Who are your style icons and why?
Steve McQueen for his casual ruggedness and James Bond for his classic sophistication.

What was your biggest fashion blunder?
Owning a leisure suit in the late '70s.

Items in your closet you can't live without?
Earnest Sewn Jeans, Andrew Marc leather jacket and Fiorentini + Baker boots.

What's your go-to outfit?
Jeans, collared shirt, leather blazer, Panerai watch, Maui Jim shades.

What do you save on?
T-shirts.

What do you splurge on?
Sumptuous cashmere sweaters.

Items you've got your eye on?
Cucinelli cashmere pea coat with horn buttons.

Current obsession in your wardrobe?
Watches.

Trend you hate?
The color yellow.

A look you love but are afraid to try?
If I love it, I will try it.

True or false: People are born with style?
True. Style comes from the inside out.

HOMETOWN:

CURRENT RESIDENCE:
Boston

How would you describe your style?
Classic with a modern edge.

Favorite designers?
Reality: Diane von Furstenberg, Donna Karan, J Brand denim, Theory. Dreamland (meaning out of my price range but on my radar): Bottega Veneta, Burberry Prorsum.

What do you tend to focus on in your wardrobe?
I think I have a shoe addiction for sure, and I have a crazy amount of handbags. However, I'd say my collection of denim and my obsession with finding the perfect fit trumps all other focuses.

Describe your perfect shopping day.
My perfect shopping day would include American Express calling me in the morning to say everything I want is on them.... OK that won't happen. I don't ever have a full day to shop. So I guess the perfect day would mean I have nowhere else to be, encounter only helpful and honest salespeople, and can focus [just] on [myself]. I like to shop alone, and [then] meet up with my sister for a glass of wine or dinner when I'm done to show her my loot. Oh, and I'm suddenly a perfect size 6. That's a perfect shopping day.

Items in your closet you can't live without?
Shoes! J Brand Love Story jeans, Paige Robertson jeans, DKNY Black cosy and Theory tank tops.

What do you save on?
If I want something really trendy I will buy it at H&M or Target. I like to save my spending for pieces that will last.

What do you splurge on?
Coats, jewelry, shoes and boots.

Trend you hate?
Parachute pants. No one—not even MC Hammer—can pull them off.

A look you love but are afraid to try?
I don't think I am afraid to try anything—it's more a matter of knowing what works on my body. For example, I love maxi dresses, but it just isn't a good look for me.

True or false: People are born with style?
One of my favorite quotes is "Fashion can be bought. Style one must possess," [from] Edna Woolman Chase, Vogue editor in chief, 1914–1952. So my answer is true.

CURRENT RESIDENCE:
Brookline, Mass.

How would you describe your style?
I'm inspired by mirror-balls, bright lights, Osaka fashion tribes, caped villains and stark apocalyptic colors. My style is for the city at night.

Where do you like to shop in Boston?
AWOL, Proletariat, LAB and Technical.

Favorite designers?
I like this South Korean brand called Style Engine by Hong Jung Suk. I also love JC/DC, Blond, Prada, Jeremy Scott and Takuya Angel.

What items get you the most compliments?
I have a pair of boots by Love Hunter and some custom lab-diamond bracelets made for this boutique in Osaka that everyone compliments me on. I lost one of them on Beacon Street!

Who are your style icons and why?
Native Americans, city squatters and Asian boy bands.

Items in your closet you can't live without?
My white and black plain T-shirts, my leather shoes/sneakers and my tight dark denims. I can't live without black.

What do you save on?
I eat less and shop more.

Items you've got your eye on?
I'm thinking of buying a winter coat from Dirk Liu, so long as it doesn't say Dirk Liu all over it. Good coats are impossible to find.

Trend you hate?
Bright-colored "stunner shades" which you can find at Urban Outfitters and kiosks in New York's Chinatown; shirts with headphones/sneakers on them; shirts that say something the person would be too afraid to say themselves; people who wear head-to-toe Ed Hardy. Stars and skulls are killing me, too. The '80s neon candy-pop scene came back, but I'm bored of how fleeting that trend is—use in moderation.

A look you love but are afraid to try?
Tribal makeup, inflatable jackets and medieval armor or investing in a shaman's feathered headdress. Sometimes I want to dress like Mary-Kate Olsen but that's a secret.

True or false: People are born with style?
False. People are born naked. Having style is just about aspiring to be something better than naked.

How would you describe your style?
A little bit country and a little bit rock 'n' roll.

Where do you like to shop in Boston?
Stel's. The clothes are interesting and innovative, and the owners aren't afraid to talk politics, which makes it even more fun.

Favorite designers?
I'd rather focus on good design than designers, and what might fit my small frame, which is no easy task—I'm a petite petite.

What do you tend to focus on in your wardrobe?
Shoes, as I have a very small foot so my options are limited.

What items get you the most compliments?
I get the most compliments when I am out with my two daughters; they are my cutest accessories.

Describe your perfect shopping day.
When my husband does the shopping.

Who are your style icons and why?
Audrey Hepburn (forever lovely) and Madonna (still fierce at 50).

Your biggest fashion blunder?
The Working Girl look circa late '80s, early '90s. I was drowning in shoulder pads.

Items in your closet you can't live without?
My two leather jackets.

What do you save on?
Shoes.

What do you splurge on?
Again, shoes. It's either feast or famine.

Current obsession in your wardrobe?
Cleaning out my closet.

Trend you hate?
MC Hammer pantaloon-styled pants—absurd.

A look you love but are afraid to try?
Sarah Palin's beehive, but only if it gets me a shot at the Oval Office.

True or false: People are born with style?
True and false—some are born with it, and others work at it with just as good results.

HOMETOWN:

CURRENT RESIDENCE:
Boston

How would you describe your style?
Simple, classic silhouettes combined with the unexpected (color, texture, messy hair).

Favorite designers?
In my everyday life, I go for a mix of 3.1 Phillip Lim, Club Monaco, Diane von Furstenberg and Theory. In my fantasy life, I'd say Rei Kawakubo for Comme des Garçons, Alber Elbaz for Lanvin and Olivier Theyskens for Nina Ricci.

What do you tend to focus on in your wardrobe?
Scarves! Mostly because I'm always feeling cold, but it's also a good way to add some color and contrast to an outfit.

Describe your perfect shopping day.
I enjoy shopping for food just as much as shopping for clothes. My perfect shopping day consists of a stroll through the South End with stops at Looc and Formaggio, followed by a spin through Louis Boston, Barneys and the Copley Square farmers' market.

Who are your style icons and why?
Audrey Hepburn and Kate Moss. Very different styles, but both assume and transcend their clothes. You see a person there, not an outfit. That is hard to accomplish.

Items in your closet you can't live without?
White shirts.

What's your go-to outfit?
A striped boatneck and a pea coat. I don't know why, but I have a huge nautical fetish. Maybe it's because I work on the waterfront.

What do you save on?
Jeans. Two decent pairs, and you're good for the next few years.

What do you splurge on?
The classic and the exceptional, whatever form that comes in. I once bought a beautiful, black silk obi (belt) in Tokyo. I've never worn it, but I like to know it's there.

Trend you hate?
Flip-flops. Yuck.

A look you love but are afraid to try?
Those baggy, balloon pants that look so chic on fashion editors. I would look like a clown.

True or false: People are born with style?
False! The ability to transform is key to good style.

How would you describe your style?
Classy with a bit of sexy.

How does your style reflect your personality?
I'm a girly girl so my style shows I'm a little flirty but still all about business.

Where do you like to shop in Boston?
Bloomingdale's, Lord & Taylor, Neiman Marcus, Ann Taylor and Wrentham Village Premium Outlets (not Boston, but close).

Favorite designers?
Diane von Furstenberg, Calvin Klein, YSL and Dolce & Gabbana.

Describe your perfect shopping day.
A gorgeous fall day and my husband driving me to Woodbury Common in New York (best outlet ever) while I sleep. He drops me off with no time limit on how long I can shop, and he doesn't ask how much I spent when he picks me up. Then I sleep the entire way home. A girl can dream, right?

What was your biggest fashion blunder?
Not dressing for the occasion. When I was a reporter in Indiana my boss called me in her office and told me it wasn't appropriate to wear a skirt suit and heels while covering tornado damage. But let me tell you, I looked good stepping over downed trees and power lines in my stilettos and miniskirt!

What's your go-to outfit?
My navy pantsuit. Hillary Clinton got a lot of grief about her pantsuits, but they're a no-brainer if you're getting dressed in a hurry.

What do you save on?
Jewelry. The diamonds in my wedding rings are real and my watch is Baume & Mercier. Everything else is silver or costume. When it comes to earrings and jewels, you can't really tell if it's a diamond, emerald or a CZ on TV.

Current obsession in your wardrobe?
Dresses. Which is a shame because I'm always wearing jackets at work. Jackets just cover up the dress! It breaks my heart because I keep buying them but don't wear them alone on the set.

Trend you hate?
Skinny jeans! How's a girl with hips supposed to get in those things?

True or false: People are born with style?
False. Tell yourself you look marvelous, hold your head up and smile. Nothing looks better than confidence.

NAME:

HOMETOWN:
Washington, D.C.

CURRENT RESIDENCE:
Revere, Mass.

How would you describe your style?
Jeans and T-shirt guy coming to terms with the hipster/musician style.

How does your style reflect your personality?
I'm a pretty laid-back guy, so comfort is pretty important for my clothes. I'm not super-flashy either, so I tend to go with earthy colors.

Where do you like to shop in Boston?
H&M, Gap and Club Monaco.

Describe your perfect shopping day.
On the couch watching football, playing some guitar and ordering some clothes online.

What was your biggest fashion blunder?
Wearing clothes far too big for me for about 10 years. And the severely tapered acid-washed jeans I recently saw from a picture when I was 13. My mother was clearly punishing me for something.

Items in your closet you can't live without?
Pants, 'cause they tend to arrest you without those.

What do you save on?
Jeans. Every guy knows they're self-washing. Gimme two good pairs (in case I spill nachos and whiskey on one).

What do you splurge on?
I recently bought a nice pair of fashionable glasses, 'cause my old rounded ones were drawing too many Harry Potter comparisons. Now people just tell me I look like Rivers Cuomo, so that's better.

Items you've got your eye on?
I need a really good tailored suit, but I'm waiting until I've saved up enough to get a nice one. Although I'll probably end up buying a guitar with that money. Addictions are hard to kick.

Current obsession in your wardrobe?
My band and I have been on a sneaker bender lately. One recent tour we hit some outlet malls and ended up with 15 pairs between the four of us. We should be sponsored by Puma and Adidas.

A look you love but are afraid to try?
Cool hats. I'd love to be able to rock a fedora, Kangol, anything. But I must have a weirdly shaped head, 'cause they always look silly on me.

True or false: People are born with style?
True. My cousin's first words were, "This bib is not Armani."

A LOVE HATE Relationship

Three outfits. Six outfits. All sorts of opinions.

By Marni Elyse Katz Photographs by Tracy Powell

Still flush with the thrill of the buy, you rush home to model your latest purchase for your partner. You mug in front of the mirror, giddy over your good taste. Perhaps you scored a dress that hides those five extra pounds, or a funky pair of shoes straight from the runway. Maybe you found a jacket that screams Bill Murray, or skinny jeans that would make a rock star proud. And all you get for your fashion sense is a blank stare, a look of distaste and a compliment so sugarcoated it oozes insincerity. Unless you're the kind of couple who has a don't ask, don't tell policy when it comes to dressing. Well, we asked, and they told. And it wasn't pretty.

Jacob & Rachel

Jacob and Rachel are juniors at Boston University. Jacob, who hails from London, studies international relations. Rachel is a communications major who interns at IMG in New York City during breaks.

Jacob: I wish Rachel would get more dressed up for the day. London girls are more glitz and glam.

Rachel: And it's quite obnoxious.

Jacob: She should wear stilettos and jewelry. And brush her hair. I'm not asking her to have a full blow-dry every morning, just put in a bit more effort. Maybe some blush in the winter.

Rachel: A lot of girls are glitzed up for class; they look ridiculous.

Jacob: She's so plain Jane. Her clothes are very standard and boring.

Rachel: They're simple and classic.

Jacob: Her high-waisted jeans are too baggy. Not a good look. And they're the trendiest things she has, which is pretty weak. And that yellow coat. [Laughs and bites his hand.]

Rachel: What are you laughing about?

Jacob: The coat.

Rachel: It's a pea coat. Stop.

Jacob: Who's the teddy bear that has the yellow coat? Paddington Bear. That's what she looks like. I wish she'd dress more like me.

Rachel: Eurotrashy?

Jacob: Yeah.

Rachel: He's more into clothes than most guys.

Jacob: I wouldn't dispute that.

Rachel: He looks very materialistic. He's a label whore. He dresses like a teenybopper, a Back Street Boy.

Jacob: At the moment I'm into skinny jeans and plaid shirts, black accessories, headbands, scarves, lots of scarves right now. And high tops.

Rachel: His high-top sneakers are so high, they look weird.

Jacob: They're boxing boots.

Rachel: You're not going boxing. And he has these black skinny pants with a shiny stripe down the leg that he wears every night.

Jacob: I have them in four colors. They have a guitar pick holder instead of a coin pocket.

Ricardo & Michael

Ricardo and Michael live in the South End. Ricardo is in real estate and Michael is an entrepreneur.

Ricardo: Michael's style is classic Americana. I like the way he dresses. But when he tries to do funky, it looks wrong. I'm a little more freestyle.

Michael: I have to struggle to get the look right. I like to wear stylish clothes, but Ricardo needs to style me. Oftentimes I throw on my shorts and an old T-shirt. If I feel comfortable in something, I wear it a lot.

Ricardo: Like those shoes.

Michael: What's wrong with these shoes?

Ricardo: There are other shoes to wear.

Michael: They're Converse, classic.

Ricardo: In general, he looks fine, but when he obsesses over an outfit, he never takes it off. Those shorts he's worn for three summers, and I mean every single day from June to September.

Michael: I bought them in Provincetown three years ago. They're comfortable.

Ricardo: Here's Michael's favorite T-shirt. He thinks he's a rock 'n' roll god when he wears it. He thinks he looks hot in it.

Michael: I do look hot in it.

Ricardo: You're almost middle-aged. It has a skull with a rock 'n' roll rose on it. And it's too fitted. Actually, I bought it for myself—like five years ago! He likes to recycle my clothes. It's like having a younger brother.

Michael: Ricardo has great style. Not flashy, it's effortless and chic. But there are some things I don't like. Let's see... the Thom Brown red, white and blue plaid jacket.

Ricardo: Come on, it's a great jacket, and I got a great deal on it. I love the fit.

Michael: It fits him beautifully, but it's too loud. When we walked in, everyone knew we were there. I mean, do we have to announce ourselves at every party?

Ricardo: It was perfect.

Ryan and Jenn

Ryan is a scientist at a bio-pharmaceutical company. Jenn works at a law firm and teaches pilates. They live together in the North End.

Jenn: Other girls restyle their boyfriends once a relationship gets serious. I wouldn't do that. I like how Ryan dresses.

Ryan: Thank you.

Jenn: His robe is the only thing I hate. And that yellow hat. It's blinding. I got the robe from my company as a Christmas gift. He saw it and was so excited. He rolls up the sleeve to hide the name of the law firm. It's my trash but his treasure.

Ryan: It's fantastic.

Jenn: He wears it all day on Sunday, watching football.

Ryan: The prerequisite for her moving in was that Sundays are mine. She can redecorate, but on Sundays I get the couch, the TV and the robe.

Jenn: I tied bows around the curtains. I'm a girly girl.

Ryan: Jenn dresses in a very preppy style—almost church-like, though she doesn't like when I say that. Her outfits for teaching pilates are hip-hoppy. I have to laugh. I think it's funny that she's trying to make her students think she's cool. If they only knew she really wears cardigans, pearls and bows.

Jenn: It's true. I wear my brother's lacrosse sweats, a tank top, gold hoop earrings and a bandanna around my head.

Ryan: It's so cheesy.

Jenn: It started when I applied to teach aerobics in college. They asked me to teach a funk class. I was a ballet dancer, so I made stuff up. I was nervous. People told me I needed an image. So I wore something you'd see on MTV. The girls loved it. They lined up to take my classes. I was cool.

Ryan. Oh, please. [Eye roll.]

HAIR SHE IS

WAKE UP AND SMELL THE peroxide when Legally Blonde: The Musical bends and snaps its way into town. This adaptation of the hit Reese Witherspoon movie tells the familiar story of a Malibu Barbie's journey to reclaim love. Hoping to win back her boyfriend, Elle Woods crash lands at Harvard Law School with chihuahua in tow. Tickling the Crimson pink, she eventually finds herself and proves that stupidity is in the eye of the beholder. Pop-culture references and sugary sweet tunes make the romantic rehashing new again, and star Becky Gulsvig's pipes prove she's more than just a pretty face. The Boston stop on the national tour marks the first time the show has played to audiences in the Bay State. And with the Broadway production having closed on Oct. 19, the Opera House is the only place to catch the musical. Extra snaps for that!

Bump in the Night

Vamp It Up

Sharpen your pitchforks or polish your halos for the Sinners and Saints Halloween Ball on Oct. 25 at Vinalia. Prizes go to the standouts in both categories. And for those who can't commit to heaven or hell, there's "best overall costume." No going as "yourself," "yuppie" or "alcoholic." Lack of creativity is an unforgivable sin.

Movies Edited by Nick Altschuller and Amanda Knorr

Capsules by Sean Burns

Appaloosa ★★ ½ I've always figured that Westerns are like pizza or sex: Even when mediocre, they're still pretty good. As far as the genre goes, Ed Harris' second directorial effort aspires to be more traditional than other recent revisionist works like Deadwood or The Assassination of Jesse James. Harris stars as a quick-tempered gun-for-hire recruited to rescue the title town from Jeremy Irons' nefarious, marble-mouthed robber baron. This leisurely-paced picture, adapted from a novel by local institution Robert Parker, coasts on the laconic chemistry between the star and his sidekick, played by Viggo Mortensen, who delivers another odd, endearing performance as a gunsmith more philosophical than his profession might suggest. Conversely, Renée Zellweger is too polished and perky to provide the lewd sparks required as a mysterious widow aiming to tear these longtime partners apart. Harris is content to amble along this well-trod terrain, offering small pleasures in lieu of urgency. (At Boston Common, Fenway and in the suburbs.)

Blindness ★ ½ Not all successful books were meant to be movies. In Fernando Meirelles' excruciating adaptation of Nobel Prize-winner José Saramago's novel, Julianne Moore stars as the one person in the world immune to a mysterious plague that has rendered mankind blind. Sadly, the premise's vast narrative potential is lost on Meirelles and screenwriter Don McKellar, who try to make grandiose statements about humanity by herding everybody into a dilapidated insane asylum to play out the umpteenth variation on Lord of the Flies. Bereft of momentum, this is the kind of movie where characters don't have names, but instead carry designations like "Doctor" and "Doctor's Wife." The pretentiousness becomes asphyxiating as Meirelles' shaky handheld-camera trickery and fondness for squalor clash against the material, and only serves to underline how completely illogical everything is. (At Boston Common, Harvard Square and in the suburbs.)

Body of Lies ★★ Much like Alec Baldwin, Russell Crowe is way more fun when he's fat. Excess poundage seems to bring out an intense actor's more playful instincts, and Crowe is a porcine, honey-drawled delight as the smirking embodiment of American arrogance in Ridley Scott's otherwise dreary espionage thriller. David Ignatius' knotty novel was adapted by The Departed screenwriter William Monahan. Once again, we've got Leonardo DiCaprio undercover and in over his head. Scott has never been much interested in storytelling, and Body of Lies is so busy with showy aerial photography and confusingly edited action sequences that the plot doesn't really kick in until about halfway through. DiCaprio tries to track down a terrorist while juggling the suspicions of a Jordanian intelligence authority (an excellent Mark Strong) and the demands of a tacked-on romantic subplot involving an Iranian nurse. Crowe steals the show from the sidelines, stuffing his face and all but begging for a movie of his own. (At Boston Common, Fenway and in the suburbs.)

Burn After Reading ★★★ ½ Don't be fooled by the vibrant colors of Emmanuel Lubezki's cinematography or the giant cartoon performances of the cast, because Joel and Ethan Coen's follow-up to their masterful No Country for Old Men is every bit as bleak as its Oscar-lauded predecessor. It's just a heck of a lot funnier. For reasons too convoluted to explain here, Brad Pitt's exuberant himbo gym instructor tries blackmailing John Malkovich's boozy CIA burnout, with more than a few unforeseen complications arriving via George Clooney's sleazy lothario and Tilda Swinton as the world's meanest pediatrician. Shot, cut and scored with the ominous overtones of a paranoid thriller yet performed as broad farce for maximum dissonance, the Coens send all this silliness spiraling into bloodshed with clockwork precision. Like most of the movies from these gifted, dyspeptic brothers, Burn is secretly about the tragic smallness of people and the fatality of self-absorption. Every character is doomed by assuming they're more important to the plot than they actually are. (At Boston Common, Fenway and in the suburbs.)

Choke ★★ ½ Actor-turned-director Clark Gregg's cheerfully offensive, visually pedestrian adaptation of Chuck Palahniuk's beloved cult novel is another extensively annotated manual of modern male malaise. The invaluable Sam Rockwell stars as a self-loathing sex addict who hustles folks for money by pretending to choke at upscale restaurants. The root of his issues begins with childhood trauma at the hands of his insane mom (Anjelica Houston), while her angelic doctor (Kelly Macdonald) suggests there might be some divine intervention at work. Nobody does dirtbags better than Rockwell, always showing us the lost little boy lurking beneath the stripper jokes and blasphemous asides. Deliberately lo-fi and dingy, the movie attempts to ground Palahniuk's

ALL IN THE FAMILY

Jonathan Demme masterfully mixes humor and sorrow.

Rachel Getting Married
Starring Anne Hathaway, Rosemarie DeWitt, Bill Irwin, Mather Zickel, Tunde Adebimpe and Debra Winger. Written by Jenny Lumet. Directed by Jonathan Demme. At Coolidge Corner, Kendall Square and Waltham Embassy.

JONATHAN DEMME'S Rachel Getting Married is dedicated to Robert Altman, as well it should be. Borrowing the late master's roving camerawork, crowded frames and famously wandering ear, it transforms a weekend wedding party into a tapestry of jumbled humanity. Like most Altman movies, it feels more discovered than staged, and you'll immediately want to go back for a second viewing to absorb all that's bustling in the margins.

But while Demme may have incorporated Altman's technique, he's not interested in mimicking his sardonic sensibility. Perhaps more than any other modern filmmaker, Demme possesses a deeply humanist temperament, evident in the contagious affinity for his characters no matter how exasperating they may be.

And Kym is plenty exasperating. Played by Anne Hathaway—barely recognizable under a stringy bob and an omnipresent cloud of sarcasm and cigarette smoke—she has scored a weekend pass out of rehab to attend her older sister Rachel's wedding. A bundle of nervous energy and cutting rejoinders, Kym's idea of complimenting the bride is, "You look so good I'd swear you were puking again."

Rosemarie DeWitt's Rachel is right to be weary, as Kym can't help but suck all the energy out of a room and refocus it on herself. To be upstaged at your own wedding is the cruelest of fates, and the stuff of seriously cringe-worthy comedy. But here there's something else simmering beneath the surface that Demme acknowledges only obliquely at first. It goes beyond the flat narcissism that fueled similar, much shallower shenanigans in last year's Margot at the Wedding, for Kym might be overbearing, but she's also obviously overcompensating.

I must tread lightly here, as one of the great pleasures of Jenny Lumet's screenplay rests in the way crucial information is gradually parceled out to reshape our understanding of previous scenes. Suffice it to say, years ago there was a tragedy, the kind from which no family ever truly recovers, and what's most miraculous about Rachel Getting Married is just how expertly Demme navigates Lumet's hairpin tonal shifts. The film swings from hilarious to crushing and then back again, sometimes within the space of a single scene. There's much joy in this movie, and also much pain.

The film swings from hilarious to crushing and then back again.

Demme has always had a penchant for packing his pictures with multicultural musicians, so naturally Rachel's wedding is an Indian/Hawaiian-themed extravaganza of vibrant fashions and live performances, with her dearly beloved, Sidney (TV On The Radio frontman Tunde Adebimpe), singing Neil Young lyrics instead of vows. The guests, who include everybody from Robyn Hitchcock to Fab Five Freddy, take turns at the bandstand to provide a jubilant, varied score that guides these damaged souls toward something close to forgiveness.

Hathaway is a revelation, all nerves and anxiety atop a hopeless longing she can't quite articulate. As long-suffering Rachel, DeWitt delivers a fittingly stealthy performance, simmering with resentment while her spotlight is perpetually stolen. Great stage actor Bill Irwin plays their father with an aching exuberance. Hurling his lanky frame into overly emotive embraces while doting on his daughters, Irwin paints the portrait of a man who has suffered so much in the past that he's determined to revel in any stray moments of happiness that head his way now.

Alas, the same cannot be said for Kym and Rachel's mother. The brilliant Debra Winger came out of retirement for a small, devastating turn that reminds us how much the industry suffers without her. In the brief time she's on screen, Winger shows us someone who's shut down by grief and so responds to sorrow by refusing to engage. Only Kym can rattle long-buried feelings in a scene so nakedly powerful it's almost unbearable to watch.

Such moments are where Demme's goofy, inclusive humanism and lively settings serve as a life preserver for the audience. It's easy to imagine Lumet's scenario as a brutal melodrama, but cinematographer Declan Quinn's handheld camera, a fascinating array of bit players and the cockeyed conviviality of this crammed estate all battle valiantly against despair.

There's so much damned exuberance and life carrying on in and outside of the frame that Rachel Getting Married exudes hopefulness through the tears. Altman would be pleased. ✖✖✖ surreal tangents in ugly, everyday surroundings, but the choice undercuts this very funny film as the storyline exits the realm of the rational. The flat, distant direction keeps us walled out of Rockwell's mounting paranoia. For the loony finale to pay off, we need to share his mania, not just observe it. (At Boston Common, Kendall Square and Waltham Embassy.)

The Duchess ★★ Relatively painless, at least by the standards of awards-season chum, this overdesigned costume drama stars a too-modern Keira Knightley as poor Georgiana Spencer, a woman trapped in an arranged marriage to Ralph Fiennes' dreaded Duke of Devonshire. She's expected to produce an heir, and any paltry concerns like conversation are beside the point. A beloved fashionista and belle of the Whig Party, Georgiana's sprawling social life can't compensate for her domestic drudgery, especially after the Duke installs his mistress (Hayley Atwell) in a bedroom down the hall. The filmmakers pound home the historical parallels between Georgiana and Princess Diana, to the point where you can't help imagining a paparazzi pursuit of her horse-drawn carriage. With a contemptuous sneer, he plays the Duke not as a villain, but as a simple man suffering from such selfish tunnel vision that he responds to all the tears and ruined lives in his wake with surprised annoyance. ADVERTISING DEADLINE: OCTOBER 22

Flash of Genius ★ ½ Director Marc Abraham's debut follows a long patent dispute regarding the invention of the intermittent windshield-wiper motor. It's not as exciting as it sounds. Greg Kinnear stars as Bob Kearns, a devoted dad who sees his design stolen by the Ford Motor Company, then spends the rest of his life fighting for credit. Structured as a simplistic David and Goliath story and photographed like a 1980s TV movie, Flash of Genius follows plucky Bob as he wrangles with legal issues for years on end and immerses himself in Byzantine law precedents while his family falls apart, which all builds up to the inevitable courtroom theatrics. Despite Kinnear's attempts to hint at a darker side, Kearns is pure milquetoast. Lauren Graham tamps down her charisma and sleepwalks through the long-suffering wife routine, and even dependable Dermot Mulroney flatlines as Bob's business partner. The only pizzazz arrives via a brief, hambone turn from Alan Alda as a smooth-talking lawyer who seems to have wandered in from another, far more engaging movie. (At Boston Common, Fenway and in the suburbs.)

Ghost Town ★★ David Koepp is Hollywood's go-to screenplay fixer for every big-budget production plagued with multiple drafts of conflicting scripts from various writers. Whether we're talking Mission: Impossible, Spider-Man or the most recent Indiana Jones, Koepp can be counted on to synthesize it all into something filmable. So it's fitting that his latest directorial effort is a mishmash of Always, The Sixth Sense, Groundhog Day and at least a dozen other, more original movies. Ricky Gervais, the brilliant creator of BBC's The Office and Extras, slums for a Hollywood paycheck as a curmudgeonly dentist who sees dead people, while Greg Kinnear's obnoxious tuxedoed specter haunts him into busting up the remarriage plans of widow Téa Leoni. Koepp's camera placement is as prosaic as his cut-and-paste screenplay, with the only fresh air arriving via Gervais' invaluable ad-libbing and surprising chemistry with Leoni. The unlikely couple tries in vain to make the movie more than an exhausted photocopy. (At Boston Common and in the suburbs.)

How to Lose Friends & Alienate People ★ ½ This hokey adaptation of Toby Young's memoir is dated and, like the author himself, nowhere near as edgy or amusing as it thinks it is. The self-styled rebel made a ruckus at Vanity Fair in the go-go '90s, crashing and burning on a booze-fueled romp with the jet set, and this big-screen bungling fares no better. Simon Pegg charmlessly steps into Young's shoes, irritating the in-crowd of Manhattan elites with his soccer hooligan behavior and lusting after Megan Fox's empty-headed starlet. Quaintly pretending the Internet doesn't exist, while simultaneously exhibiting no understanding of how magazines, publicists or even movies actually work, director Robert Weide keeps to garishly overlit slapstick. Constantly referencing Fellini's La Dolce Vita as a cheap shortcut, the movie squanders countless opportunities to skewer our Paris Hilton celebutante era. Only Jeff Bridges, in a Ben Franklin wig as a poorly disguised Graydon Carter, summons the appropriate aura of pampered self-loathing. (At Boston Common, Fenway and in the suburbs.)

Lakeview Terrace ★★ ½ In a long-ago era called the 1990s, director Neil LaBute's cloddish button-pushing was considered fashionable, and the shallow, stagey misanthropy of In the Company of Men or Your Friends and Neighbors opened to inexplicable critical praise. Recently, times have been rough for LaBute, as anyone who saw his unintentionally hilarious remake of The Wicker Man can attest. However, the chic, vacuous cynic may have finally found his true calling. Lakeview Terrace is a prefab Hollywood thriller destined for Sunday afternoon cable, but the director sprays a thick coat of his patented distaste over this umpteenth remake of Unlawful Entry, and the result is improbably entertaining. Samuel L. Jackson stars as a scary, boozy cop terrorizing his haughty, environmentalist neighbors Patrick Wilson and Kerry Washington. LaBute's puddle-deep provocations regarding race and gender, now free from an art-house backdrop, are perfectly suited for the empty jolts of crass exploitation common in pictures like this one. (At Boston Common, Fenway and in the suburbs.)

Man on Wire ★★★ ½ Funny how the most exciting heist picture in ages turns out to be a documentary. Director James Marsh's artfully crafted, edge-of-your-seat adventure tells the tale of tightrope walker Philipe Petit, who one morning in 1974 danced on a high-wire between the World Trade Center's Twin Towers. Combining hyperbolically shot reenactments and stunning archival footage with the gregarious reminiscences of Petit and his band of coconspirators, Marsh lays out the elaborate break-in with the snap precision and cinematic verve of a Danny Ocean caper. All the more poignant for never once mentioning 9/11, the movie uses old photographs to let the majestic towers speak for themselves, which lends Man On Wire a shade of sorrow the filmmaker is wise enough not to push. Petit is a florid and quixotic interview subject perfectly in sync with the film's evocation of the anything-goes paradise that was New York City in the 1970s. The breathtaking climax triggers many contradictory emotions as Petit's stunt was so reckless, so foolish and so magical. (At Coolidge Corner and in the suburbs.)

Miracle at St. Anna ★ ½ Spike Lee is one of the most exciting filmmakers we have, but he doesn't make small mistakes. His failures are as bold as his successes, as evidenced by this hysterically overwrought wreck that attempts to rebuke Hollywood for whitewashing the contributions of African American soldiers in the Great War. Based on a novel by James McBride, it begins with an outrageously unnecessary framing device full of distracting cameos by Lee's stock company, and the film only grows more rudderless from there. The snarled chronology finds flashbacks inside flashbacks, but eventually we land on four deeply unappealing buffalo soldiers speechifying behind enemy lines in Tuscany. Aesthetically, one minute Lee's trying to mimic the stagebound look of 1940s WWII flicks, and the next he's working rhythms from the 1950s' Italian neo-realist movement. These conflicting styles keep clanging against one another, and the battle sequences prove shockingly poor for a director of Lee's caliber. Watch out for sexism and the forehead-smacking, pseudo-religious finale. (At Boston Common, Fenway and in the suburbs.)

Nick and Norah's Infinite Playlist ★★★ ½ If you can get past the most twee movie title in years, director Peter Sollett's follow-up to his endearing indie hit Raising Victor Vargas turns out to be unexpectedly adorable. It's sincere and awkward where Juno was fabricated and crass. Michael Cera stars as a heartbroken teen bass player, a straight man in an all-gay punk band, the name of which cannot be printed here.

Through a variety of convoluted circumstances, he finds himself stuck in a Yugo after a gig with Kat Dennings' insecure dreamgirl. They cruise the streets of New York City after curfew, meandering through misadventures and fumbling toward puppy love. Based on a young adult novel by Rachel Cohn and David Levithan, Nick and Norah exudes an uncommon sensitivity, patiently allowing these kids to mumble and make mistakes, so unlike their poised peers on film and television. As in Victor Vargas, there's a real delicacy to Sollett's direction, with an almost enchanted sense of late-night magic infusing his grungy East Village settings. (At Boston Common, Fenway and in the suburbs.)

Religulous ★★ Amusing, but in a way that's cheap and makes you feel sullied afterward, comedian Bill Maher's anti-religion film is a worthwhile concept botched in the execution. Traveling from trailer parks to the Vatican, Maher and director Larry Charles position themselves as skeptical crusaders preaching the gospel of rationality and science to folks who have little use for either. But zealotry is an easy target, and it doesn't exactly require a great deal of skill to make a creationist look like an imbecile. Maher's thesis, namely that some form of organized religion will catalyze the end of civilization, isn't entirely unreasonable. The problem is that the comic spends most of the movie riffing on addled lunatics who are no match for his formidable intellect, and a stale smugness sets in. Maher's invaluable HBO show finds him at his best because he's being challenged, and a braver, tougher movie would force him to debate reasonable people of faith, instead of just sneering at crackpots. (At Boston Common, Kendall Square and in the suburbs.)

Matt Lankes

Not-So-Wild West

Gunslung Heroes Ed Harris and Viggo Mortensen play cowboys in Appaloosa, Harris' second directorial effort and a more traditional take on the popular Western.

Righteous Kill ★ It's just sad. Thirteen years ago Al Pacino and Robert De Niro teamed up to deliver towering performances in Michael Mann's intricate cops-and-robbers epic Heat, in which they shrewdly mined their iconic '70s personas to set a '90s standard for alpha male swagger. Now they're together again for Jon Avnet's atrocious Righteous Kill, a cheap, gimmicky vigilante thriller adept only at showing just how far the mighty have fallen. Both actors are at least two decades too old for their roles as beat detectives tracking a serial killer who hunts bad guys and writes lousy poetry. A bored Pacino chews a lot of gum and bugs his eyes out occasionally, while De Niro's work is a genuine tragedy. Lazy and overweight, he mopes and mumbles his way through the movie unable to convincingly portray anger. Russell Gewirtz's sorry screenplay hinges on a plot twist telegraphed from the very first frames, so Avnet ladles on the labored misdirection and misogyny to distract us from the obvious. Depressing. Vicky Cristina Barcelona ★★ ½ Though problematic and slightly sloppy, this pleasant trifle is Woody Allen's most consistent effort since 1999's loopy La Strada remake, Sweet and Lowdown. Rebecca Hall and Scarlett Johansson star as Vicky and Cristina, American postgrads spending a summer in Spain. Enter Javier Bardem's free-spirited Latin lover and stock stereotype, who probably would be risible if played by any other actor. Bardem delivers his loosest, goofiest performance yet, embracing the role's mildewed clichés with contagious delight. Romantic entanglements and disentanglements ensue, complicated by stomach ulcers, girl-girl crushes and ill-advised rushes to the altar. The most fun comes from Bardem's ex-wife, a lusty psycho played in a movie-stealing turn by Penélope Cruz. Allen's direction is perkier and more alert than his recent work; he even moves the camera once in a while, soaking up the Barcelona scenery and gazing adoringly on his good-looking cast. Modest in both aim and accomplishment; it's hardly a return to form, but it'll do. (At Coolidge Corner, Kendall Square and Waltham Embassy.)

The Women ★★ The best joke in Diane English's klutzy update of George Cukor's 1939 classic might be the overabundance of screamingly obvious Boston locations, even though characters onscreen insist they're standing in Manhattan. Meg Ryan attempts to emote through some dire plastic surgery, puckering her inflated trout-pout after finding her hubby having an affair with Eva Mendes, an actress as curvy as her line readings are flat. Annette Bening rallies the rest of the Ya-Ya Sisterhood of the Traveling Whatever, and lots of shrieking ensues. There's a surprisingly complex, scene-stealing turn from Candice Bergen as Ryan's seen-it-all mom and a few good character riffs from guest-stars Cloris Leachman and Bette Midler, but English, creator of Murphy Brown, suffers from a visually inert TV sensibility. The Women feels more like a promising sitcom pilot, one that's somehow easier to take simply because none of these characters are as narcissistic, materialistic or disgusting as the ones in Sex and the City. (In the suburbs.)

NORTHERN LIGHTS

Portugal. The Man rocks a colorful potpourri.

Portugal. The Man plays Harpers Ferry Nov. 2.

Emily Dyan Ibarra

WASILLA, ALASKA. It's home to one of the year's most revelatory surprises, a maverick contender with classic roots, stumping in Boston two nights before Election Day.

We're not talking about Governor Sarah Palin. It's that other Alaskan import, Portugal. The Man, a Wasilla-bred band that plays Harper's Ferry Nov. 2 to support its kaleidoscopic new release Censored Colors, one of 2008's best pop CDs. Singer-songwriter John Baldwin Gourley, 27, remembers Palin as mayor and says her vice presidential nomination came as a shock.

"It was just crazy to me," Gourley says. "Alaska—for anybody who knows it—is a small place, a sheltered place." Few people come from a more sheltered environment than he does, having lived for a year in a log cabin with a generator and no phone. His parents mushed sled dogs.

"That was my favorite part, just hanging out with all the dogs," he says. "Growing up, it felt so strange to me. We got three TV channels, and I watched Sesame Street and said, 'Where are my neighbors? Where are the people I get to hang out with?' I ended up a really shy kid, and I still am in certain situations. I get crazy panic attacks and social anxiety.

"I have friends back home who don't even believe that I'm in a band," says Gourley, who took to performing in low-slung hats and sunglasses, turning his microphone to face fellow musicians more than audiences. "I get really nervous if I feel I have to be entertaining people. Ever since I turned the mike sideways and have been able to see everybody [onstage], it's just been so much more fun to jam together."

That kind of creative camaraderie fueled Censored Colors. Multi-instrumentalists Phil Peterson and Kirk Huffman from Seattle's Kay Kay and His Weathered Underground produced the CD, blending strings, horns and other colors from a dozen guests in addition to guitarist Gourley, bassist Zach Carothers, drummer Jason Sechrist (replaced by Garrett Lunceford on tour) and keyboardist Ryan Neighbors. Boston's Paul Q. Kolderie (Pixies, Radiohead) and Adam Taylor (Muse, the Dresden Dolls) helped produce and mix the results.

"It's amazing that we got to grow up in Alaska and—out of nowhere—we get to tour our own country and others."

Most amazingly, Portugal. The Man had hit the studio with a few rough songs and, in just two-and-a-half weeks, created a 15-song cycle with a fluid second-half suite that nods to the Beatles' Abbey Road in its sonic scope and structure.

"That was the first record that I really connected with as a little kid," says Gourley, who found Abbey Road in a box of his parents' cassette tapes. "We would drive into town and listen to oldies radio and sing along. And anybody who knows oldies radio knows that it's 90 percent Beatles."

Censored Colors reflects other influences like Sam Cooke, Motown, Led Zeppelin and the Flaming Lips in its atmospheric mash of rock, soul and even dub reggae. Less evident is the Rage Against the Machine streak (carried over from Carothers' previous cover band) that fueled earlier work. Gourley says that his group's first two albums amounted to him "playing riffs and chopping up bass lines and drum beats and building songs—basically hip-hop production with a rock band piecing things together."

The singer describes the sessions for Censored Colors as "spontaneous," but reveals that it was also the first time that he built songs from chords. "I play guitar like I play piano: I feel out the notes," he says. "Eventually we'll find a groove, but this record is the closest we've come.

"We appreciate everything at this point," says Gourley, recalling the years when Portugal. The Man (named for a random country) slept on couches and toured in a minivan with "a foot of space above the gear" for the musicians themselves. A few years ago, the band relocated from Alaska to Portland, Ore., to establish a more convenient base for travel.

"It's amazing that we got to grow up in Alaska and—out of nowhere—we get to tour our own country and others," he says from Germany. "I didn't even know we could play shows out of Alaska." ***

Blame Canada

Lysergic Reaction Kevin Barnes wasn't born in Montreal, and neither was his band. The real story behind Of Montreal's name is shrouded in the mysteries of press releases, but the group has won critical respect from its blend of strings, synthesizers, beats, harmonies, color, shape, catchy choruses and funky attitude. Of Montreal is psychedelic indie-pop at its best. Skeletal Lamping, their ninth album, follows the band's audacious pattern by being released not only in the usual CD and vinyl formats, but also as T-shirts, tote bags, stickers and lanterns—all sold with a code to download the full record. Grab a seat at the Orpheum on Oct. 30 to check out their new tracks and hazy cover of MIA's hit song "Jimmy."

"Our customers tell us,
'Don't ever change.' And they mean it."

Fiore Colella, Owner

Since 1931, generations have been craving our food. Some say their mouths water just thinking about eating here. That's why when we change even the slightest thing, they let us know it. Some things should stay as they are.

Let Your Subconscious Be Your Guide

The Surreal Life

If René Magritte's "L'Atlantide" inspires a feeling of revolt, then the Rose Art Museum has done its job. Magritte is one of more than 30 artists displayed in the exhibit Invisible Rays: The Surrealism Legacy through Dec. 14. Fans can also view the dream-inspired work of Joan Miró and others. Imagine that.
